U.S. RUM ROW MEN RUSH FOR NEW BUSINESS

Leading New York Bootleggers Are in Nova Scotia Buying Speedy Boats

ST. PIERRE TO SEND LIQUORS

Judges Expected to Ease Up on Penalties as Result of Election

By Sam Robertson, Canadian Press Staff Writer

New York, Nov. 12.—The high-powered illicit liquor trade of the eastern United States was looking toward Canada to-day for ways and means of taking advantage of an indicated relaxation of the prohibition laws.

Word having been dropped by a few judges that the landslide vote accorded last Tuesday to the Democratic Party, which had campaigned on a liquor repeal plank, would be taken as meaning the taxpayers did not wish those laws enforced too rigidly, the men who lifted bootleggers into the realm of big business wasted little time heeding the knock of opportunity.

Shortly after a New York paper had revealed that leaders of the Metropolitan liquor traffic had left for Canada seeking new "wet" supplies at St. Pierre and Miquelon, vessels to carry the "goods" in an even dozen New York bootleggers, dressed to the minute and exuding wealth, were reported seen in Halifax.

Hotel suites—the best in the house—were the polestars of pleasure and the rajahs of the night by automobile for Lunenburg, N.S. The local conclusion was that they were in the hunt for boats, to purchase outright if necessary, for the purpose of carrying liquor down to rum rows off Boston. New York and other populated seaboard points.

MUCH MONEY READY
The "trade" was said to be ready to lay out large sums for the purpose of satisfying thirsty United States citizens with the "real stuff," purchasable at St. Pierre and Miquelon, French islands south of Newfoundland.

Presumably figuring it would be harder than ever to get justice to convict in liquor cases now that the public would seem to have spoken its mind through the ballot boxes, the leaders of New York's Volstead-defying traffic—almost any newboy and certainly any taxi drivers can name them—met in a hotel conference and mapped plans.

Some of them took off by plane immediately for Halifax and others left by train. The idea behind the quick move, it was said, was to have real (Turn to Page 2, Col. 3)

Spectacular Heavenly Display Starts This Evening, But Cannot Be Seen

Denison Holds No Hope For Two Days, But Leonids Will Flash For Week

Comet gazers, who were preparing for some interesting evenings from to-night on watching the Leonid meteors flash across the skies, were disappointed by the announcement this afternoon from F. Napier Denison, meteorologist at the Dominion Observatory at Guelph, Ont., that the weather on this part of the Coast will be so thick and heavy there will be no chance of seeing anything in the skies for the next couple of days.

The Leonid meteors which make their appearance three times a century are due to inaugurate their display this evening and continue it all through next week.

Crews Make Slow Headway in Restoring Wire Communications; Local Flurries in Alberta and Saskatchewan

Winnipeg, Nov. 12.—Shaking itself out from under a thirty-six-hour blizzard, Manitoba to-day took stock of the season's first real snowstorm. Elsewhere on the prairies local snow flurries inconvenienced residents of southern Saskatchewan and northern Alberta.

Full extent of the damage in Manitoba will not be known for some days. Drifted highways to-day prevented emergency crews from making a complete survey of shattered communication systems. Communication over most of the rural telephone lines was an impossibility.

Hardest hit by the weatherman's pranks are the Winnipeg Electric Railway Company and the Manitoba Telephone System. The rural street car service was badly crippled by heaving concrete and twisted tracks.

RANGERS IN FIRST BERTH

Glasgow Team Whips Morton 6 to 1 to Gain Undisputed Lead in Scottish Football

Glasgow, Nov. 12.—Overwhelming Morton, 6 to 1, Rangers won undisputed leadership of the Scottish Football League First Division to-day. Previously tied with them, Aberdeen lost to the lowly Falkirk outfit, 2 to 0.

Vanishing over Hearts, who were defeated by Queen's Park, 3 to 1, Celtic jumped into a tie with Aberdeen for second place, each only two points behind the leading Rangers.

St. Mirren and Motherwell are only a point behind the second-place outfits now, each having won their games by decisive margins. St. Mirren's took Cowdenbeath by 7 to 0, and Motherwell swamped Ayr United, 6 to 2.

In the second division the leading Hibernians had little trouble disposing of Armadale, 8 to 2. Queen of the South broke the second-place tie with Raith Rovers when they tied Dumbarton, 1 to 1. Raith Rovers were defeated by St. Bernard's, 3 to 2.

ROOSEVELT HAS DAY OF REST

President-elect of the United States in Bed With a Cold

Associated Press
Albany, N.Y., Nov. 12.—His wife and physician have taken charge of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the next President of the United States. To-day he was resting in bed to cure a cold.

For the first time since he began his strenuous campaign for the presidency last July, Governor Roosevelt was resting at home with no visitors and no scheduled appointments to discuss state or national affairs. Mrs. Roosevelt, who arrived Thursday evening from New York, advised him to remain in bed over the week-end.

A physician found the President-elect had a little fever, but no infection of the throat or lung congestion.

Toll of Great Hurricane in Central Region of Cuba Near 2,000 Mark

Associated Press Staff Correspondent
Camaguey, Cuba, Nov. 12.—Central Cuba's hurricane death toll was near the 2,000 mark to-day as military and governmental authorities took hold of the problem of relief and rehabilitation for thousands of homeless and destitute.

But it was not necessary to figure the Caribbean coast town of Santa Cruz del Sur in these plans, for the tidal wave that followed the storm on Wednesday morning left it unfit for habitation. It may never be rebuilt on the sandy shore.

To-day the disturbance was nearly 200 miles southwest of Bermuda, opposite Wilmington, N.C., apparently with (Turn to Page 2, Col. 6)

DEBT NOTES TO BE PUBLISHED MONDAY

British and French Communications to U.S. to Be Reported By Newspapers

Canadian Press and Associated Press
Washington, Nov. 12.—The many varied speculations on the contents of the British and French debt notes has called the State Department to decide to make them public for the Monday morning papers.

Early publication was decided on to quell reports termed misleading. At first it seemed likely the notes would be kept secret until President Hoover's arrival in Washington from California.

Meantime, Secretary of State Henry L. Stimson and his assistants, as well as the British and French embassy staffs, refused to answer questions as to whether an extension of the moratorium was definitely asked or overtures made in the notes for a general reconsideration of war debt settlements without a request for suspension of the payments totalling more than $123,000,000. ## RAIN PASSES YEARLY MARK

Precipitation For First Ten and Half Months Exceeds Annual Average

With a month and half still to go, 1932's rainfall mark had exceeded the average for the year to mark up to that time to 1.25 inches. Prospects of heavy rains during the next forty-nine days promised to bring the total to well over six inches above the average for the year and might establish a record for precipitation.

Up to 5 o'clock Friday, the fall for that day was .41 of an inch. By 9:30 o'clock this morning .91 of an inch more had fallen, bringing the two-day mark up to that time to 1.25 inches. Previously during the month 2.02 of an inch had fallen, making the aggregate for the first twelve days 3.34 inches, less than an inch below the monthly average of 4.27.

Since the first of the year 26.86 inches have fallen. The average for the entire twelve months is but 36.60. With half of November and all December, two of the rainiest months, still to come, a great excess of moisture is expected to be recorded by the time the year comes to an end.

Forecasts to-day indicated continued unsettled, mild weather with rain. In northern British Columbia snow was reported falling, while on the west coast intense cold was being experienced in the north with sub-zero weather in parts of Saskatchewan.

SAYS COAL TRADE HOLDING GROUND

Vancouver, Nov. 12.—New stokers and modern plants are giving British Columbia coal a "break" in its fight against the oil in the opinion of Col. Charles W. Villiers, general manager of the Canadian Collieries (Dunsmuir) Limited, who is in Vancouver on his way to Great Britain.

Col. Villiers says the coal industry is holding its own, which is about as much as can be expected from any industry in these times.

Villiers will leave Vancouver Sunday on his way to England. He plans to return in January.

GOLD DISCOVERY IN ONTARIO REPORTED

Canadian Press
Hullabury, Ont., Nov. 12.—A gold find of "remarkable" proportions has been made in Hearst Township Larder Lake district, according to B. W. Bartley, local mining man, who holds the discovery as one that will revive interest in that section. The ground on which the strike was made was staked twenty-five years ago, but the registration was allowed to lapse and the area was thrown open this year.

The location of the discovery is within nine miles of the Hopedale Central Railway between Kirkland Lake and Roynce.

DEMAND FOR CANADA GRAIN IS STRONGER

COPPER ORDER COMES AS JOLT

Dreams of Millions From the P.G.E. Marred For Premier and Cabinet

Finance Minister Jones Concerned, Fearing Loss of Taxes and Relief Cost Rise

Visions of millions of dollars from the sale of the P.G.E., which Premier Toimle and his ministers have been enjoying at times during the last few weeks, have been marred as the week drew to a close by fears of the disruption of the B.C. copper industry through restrictions imposed on the B.C. product, barring it from the British preference as a result of the agreement reached at the Imperial Economic Conference at Ottawa.

Conferences were on at the Parliament Buildings to-day in an effort to find a way out of the difficulty. Appeals have been made to Ottawa during the last two days for a postponement of the operation of the copper agreement for two years so as to give B.C. producers a chance. It was reported at noon to-day that one of the local cabinet ministers was going to Ottawa to see if he could not force some action.

DID NOT REALIZE WHAT WAS ON
If the big copper mine and mill at Britannia closes as its copper, milled in B.C., is barred from the British four-cent preference because it passes through the Tacoma smelter, upwards of 2,500 persons at Britannia will eventually be thrown upon the government as unemployed.

The government did not know that when Premier Toimle was working hard at Ottawa for several weeks to make the Ottawa Conference a success that this included putting the copper business of British Columbia out of business, said one of the members.

"The copper industry here has been operating in a big way at Britannia and has been standing on its own feet. It is one of the few industries in this province that has not only stood on its own feet but has continued operating on a large scale since the start of the depression. Now this thing is put over on British Columbia, dooming one of our few sound industries."

Canadian Press
New York, Nov. 12.—Canadian and British currencies were on a feature during to-day's trading on the local foreign exchange market. The Canadian dollar moved within a narrow range, finishing at 89 1/4 cents, for a gain of 1/4 of one cent.

The pound sterling spurted 1 1/2 cents at the opening, ending at the close to 83 3/4, which was a gain of 1 1/2 cents over Friday.

LOAN DRIVE IS COMPLETED

To-day's Subscriptions Expected to Bring Dominion Total to $80,000,000

Canadian Press
Montreal, Nov. 12.—The new Dominion loan was within $3,500,000 of the $80,000,000 asked for when Thursday's subscriptions of $2,000,000 were added to the total to-day.

Expectation was the goal would be attained during business hours to-day. The outstanding $3,500,000 is in twenty-year bonds, which at their selling price yield an interest return of 4 1/2 per cent. Next Wednesday had been set as the final day of the campaign, but appearances to-day were that the books would be closed before then.

The three-year bonds, amounting to $25,000,000 of the $80,000,000 total, were all sold on the opening day of the loan, thirteen days ago.

BOND MARKET

The bond market continued active with prices steady.

From the Canadian point of view, although small, was an "encouraging" development. No. 1 northern cash closed on the Winnipeg market on Thursday at 66 1/2, up 1/2 from the week before. Canadian wheat is still moving in heavy volume to the United Kingdom market.

Firm Tone To-day At Liverpool

Advance in Rate of Exchange Helps Stimulate Trade at Winnipeg

Canadian Press
Winnipeg, Nov. 12.—While wheat men of the prairies anxiously scanned crop reports from Argentina and the price of exchange in New York, farmers were cheered to-day by an increase in price for their product, coupled with an overseas demand for the finest wheat in the world.

Strength of wheat prices at Liverpool and an upturn in stock prices in New York yesterday were cheerful factors viewed by the farmers as the market closed its short week-end session. An advance in the rate of exchange and a reduction in the size of Canada's exportable wheat crop also stimulated prices, which closed 1 1/4 cents to 1 1/2 cents a bushel higher than Thursday's final figures.

Closing prices on futures were: November 46 cents, December 47 1/4 and May 51 1/4, all three up 1 1/4, while July at 52 1/2 was up 1 1/4.

CONFIDENCE GROWS IN U.S. BUSINESS

With Roosevelt Elected and Political Turmoil Ended, Industrialists Are Looking Up

By Alex Fringale, Canadian Press
Toronto, Nov. 12.—The United States nears the end of the first week of freedom from political uncertainty almost boiling up with confidence that things are going to be better. A canvass of bankers and industrialists reveals a general feeling that under the new Roosevelt administration the business gains already achieved will be consolidated and the nation will go forward again to prosperity.

This feeling of hope seems to be shared beyond the confines of the United States. Stock exchanges in Canada, Britain, France and Germany "buled" the Democratic victory, mostly with their "wet" listings perhaps, but nevertheless the general tone of the markets stepped up on the election news.

During the week both stocks and bonds moved into higher ground, but, with the exception of wheat and cotton, commodities continued down-sloping or stationary. Standard statistics showed the market level at the close on Monday 4 at 54.6, against a close at 51 yesterday.

CANADIAN STOCKS UP

Canadian markets were closed yesterday, but the close Thursday found C.P.R. up 1 1/2 points for the week; Canadian National up 1 point; Nickel up 1 1/2; Ford A up 1 1/2; Smelters up 4 points; Standard Dominion up 1 1/2; Imperial Oil up 1/2 point.

On the Toronto Standard Exchange, leading gold producing stocks and the base metal shares finished the week higher.

The bond market continued active with prices steady.

From the Canadian point of view, although small, was an "encouraging" development. No. 1 northern cash closed on the Winnipeg market on Thursday at 66 1/2, up 1/2 from the week before. Canadian wheat is still moving in heavy volume to the United Kingdom market.

Campaign For Civic Honors Opens Monday

First Meeting at South Park School For E. B. Andros, Mayoralty Candidate

Ald. T. W. Hawkins Seeks Re-election; E. J. Wakeman Out Again

The first gun in the 1932 civic election campaign will be fired Monday night at a meeting sponsored by E. B. Andros, mayoralty candidate, in the South Park School.

A. I. Kirkpatrick, campaign manager for Mr. Andros, will take the chair, and will open the meeting at 8 o'clock.

Mr. Andros will be the chief speaker and has invited all other candidates for civic office to appear on the same platform. Charles Chivers, C. H. McMillan and Mrs. Alice McGregor are among those who have signified their intention to be present.

With eighteen candidates definitely in the field for the nine vacant offices—and numerous others on the prospective list, it appears the campaign this year may assume proportions similar to last year, when there was a record entry for the civic race.

SEES RE-ELECTION

Alderman T. W. C. Hawkins to-day confirmed a previous announcement that he would seek re-election, after a delegation had interviewed him yesterday offering support and asking him to stand.

Chairman of the fire wardens, and a member of the parks committee and the B.C. Agricultural Association.

E. J. Wakeman, who was in the field last year, will again run for a seat on the City Council, it was learned this morning.

Mr. Andros, in his second attempt for election as mayor, plans an active campaign with meetings every Monday and Thursday for the next month in the different wards.

BIG LUMBERMAN HERE FROM EAST

John S. Gillies of Braeside, Ont., Inspects Timber Production on Island

B.C.'s timber resources and production methods are being examined by John S. Gillies, president of Gillies Bros. Ltd., lumber manufacturers of Braeside, Ont., who reached Victoria yesterday with Thomas H. Wilkinson, secretary of the B.C. Lumber and Shingle Manufacturers' Association of Vancouver.

Reports have been current that Mr. Gillies was in the Coast in connection with a lumber deal, but this was denied by members of his party. They said his visit had no business significance. Members of the party conferred with officials of the Forestry Department to-day.

Mr. Gillies, accompanied by Mr. Wilkinson, has just returned from a trip to Port Alberni and is staying at the Empress Hotel. While up the Island he inspected the plant of the Alberni-Pacific Mills at Port Alberni.

The company of which Mr. Gillies is the directing head, was formed sixty years ago.

The present head joined the firm in 1888, becoming secretary-treasurer in 1893, later vice-president and managing director, assuming the presidency in 1928.

He is a director of the Southern Canada Power Company and a charter member and director of the Canadian Lumbermen's Association.

Clouds Bar Meteor Show

 vain to find a ray of hope for a clear sky, astronomers who operate the big twenty-two inch telescope at the Dominion Astrophysical Observatory on Little Saanich Mountain were registering disappointment. They declared, however, that as the meteor display will be on for at least a week, there is still a chance that the weather will clear in time for the dwellers on the earth to get a good view of the show.

Astrologers here are manifesting much interest in this week's heavenly display. They developed to-day that even were the sky cleared, there would be difficulty during part at least of the next couple of evenings in seeing the meteors because of the presence in the sky of a big moon. Full moon is down for Sunday night and its light would dim the meteor effect. As the moon wanes later in the week, this difficulty will be removed.

Dr. Robert G. Altken, director of the Lick Observatory, in California, today issued a statement in which he said: "Observers who sit up to watch for Leonids will learn from personal experience what a nuisance our beautiful moon can be on occasion, to astronomers, for the moon is at the full moon phase on the night of November 13 and will be high in the sky to-morrow night and the four or five following nights. The result will be that all but the very bright Leonid meteors will be lost to sight in its brilliant light."

Ascribing the swarm of Leonids to the break-up of Tempel's Comet, Dr. Altken said that "reasonably good" observers should look toward the east to the sickle-shaped constellation Leo of six stars, and the meteors will appear to emerge from the centre of the sickle's arc.

Geneva, Nov. 12.—A twenty-four hour general strike protesting the deaths of eleven persons in this week's riot went into effect in this international "peace capital" to-day while troops were mobilized as a precaution against renewed violence.

The strike was part of a demonstration of protest organized by the Socialists as an aftermath of the machine gunning of a political demonstration Wednesday.

One of the soldiers who fired on the Socialists outside an anti-socialist meeting hall was slain by the mob in that disorder.

CO-OPERATIVE MILL IS IDLE
 Men Quit Work at Mohawk Lumber Plant at New Westminster
 Canadian Press
 New Westminster, Nov. 12.—Two hundred workmen are idle on account of a strike at the Mohawk Lumber Co. Limited mill, New Westminster, which started to-day.

Pickets were posted around the mill and the pickets refused to allow the driver to enter the mill. Police were called, but when they arrived Mr. Haskell requested them not to take action, hoping the men would come to some understanding with him. The truck departed empty.

The plant had been working on a co-operative basis since April. The agreement was that the men would receive whatever percentage of their normal wages could be earned by the company's operations, but at least 50 per cent was guaranteed. The normal rate for white men was between 32 and 36 cents an hour.

Mr. Haskell stated he was at a loss to understand why the men had failed to resume work this morning as he had received no intimation a strike was impending.

TURNER VALLEY ACT UPHELD
 Canadian Press
 Calgary, Nov. 12.—The Alberta Appeal Court to-day dismissed the Spooner Oils Ltd. appeal against the decision of the Alberta Supreme Court, ruling the Turner Valley gas conservation act within the provincial legislature's powers.

TURNER VALLEY ACT IS UPHELD
 But Alberta Appeal Court Rules Out Conservation Levies on Companies
 In dismissing the appeal, the appellate court, however, ruled that sections 20, 21 and 22 of the act were ultra vires. Those sections authorized the government to impose a levy on Turner Valley companies to pay the expenses of the Turner Valley Gas Conservation Board.

Spencer Oils Limited carried their fight to the Supreme Court to have conservation in Turner Valley gas fields abolished. Counsel for the company declared conservation threatened the company's existence as it drastically cut gas and naphtha production. It was maintained under conservation there would not be enough naphtha produced for the company to make any profit.

When the supreme court upheld the conservation act, Spooners appealed the decision with to-day's dismissal the result.

At present the conservation board is nearing completion of its tests in Turner Valley. Following this a gas production limit will be set for the whole field with a view to removing wastage and thereby prolonging the field's life which government experts maintained would be short unless conservation was enforced.

He was opening the river on a narrow strip of ice when he plunged in. His father, Edward Jenkins, fifty-five, jumped into the water in an effort to rescue his son, but the current carried him down stream 300 yards and he was taken from the river unconscious.

Other duck hunters rescued the elder Jenkins. The body of the son was found about 300 yards from where he had fallen in.

 United, 7 to 0, while Aston Villa were being held to a 3 to 3 tie by Everton. The gunners now are two points ahead of the Villa.

Derby County crept up to within a point of second-place Aston Villa when they downed Bolton Wanderers, 4 to 1. Huddersfield broke the three-cornered fourth-place tie and assumed undisputed possession of that notch in the standing. They won from Birmingham, 2 to 0, while Portsmouth were being defeated by Sheffield, 2 to 1, and Leeds United were picking up a single point with a 1 to 1 tie in their game with Leicester City.

GREAT UPSET
 Southampton staged the worst upset of the season in the second division when they took the leading Stoke City aggregation into camp, 1 to 0. Stoke remained in top position, however, as they previously had a four-point advantage over Bradford City and Burnley. The latter broke the second-place tie, holding Manchester United to a 2 to 2 knotted count, while Bradford City were bowing to Swansea Town.

Brentford, the undefeated third division southern section team, brought their string of wins to twelve by taking a 3 to 1 decision from Westford.

 nothing in its path except open sea. Its force was still considered dangerous to shipping.

TOWN LIES IN RUINS
 The town of Santa Cruz del Sur presented a picture of pitiful desolation to-day. It was nothing but a shambles and where 5,000 persons had lived were only soldiers, sanitary workers and a few city officials.

Here and there rose the smoke of a funeral pyre, since it became necessary to burn bodies. The grave diggers could not bury the dead fast enough for the sanitary safety of the few who remained on guard.

CREMATE BODIES
 Capt. Frederico Tomsu on his arrival here said 800 bodies had been buried yesterday and Thursday, but cremation was ordered when every pile of debris disclosed further dead.

The official estimate of the dead in the storm rose to 1,700 during the night, but the exact number may never be known, as many in Santa Cruz were probably carried to sea by the retreating tidal waters.

Charged by reports from Havana that government agencies were perfecting relief plans rapidly, local authorities co-operated with physicians to avert epidemic, the dangerous aftermath of disaster. A few cases of measles were discovered and quickly isolated.

TRAINS CARRY REFUGEES
 The last relief train from Santa Cruz arrived around midnight, bringing in 150 refugees, most of who bore wounds. Every available shelter was used for hospital work.

Relief for the physicians who had been working unceasingly since Thursday was expected from Havana momentarily. A train with fifteen surgeons, twenty medical students and forty nurses had left the capital. Secretary of the Interior Zubizarreta was aboard.

Medical supplies and clothing were brought in by train, airplane, steamer and truck. Four trucks arrived from Havana yesterday evening.

Camaguey province bore the brunt of the winds and waves. Everywhere sugar and banana plantations were leveled and mills damaged or destroyed. The death list of Santa Cruz, however, appeared surprisingly small, under the 100-mark. Injured, however, were numerous.

CAYMAN DEATHS
 Kingston, Jamaica, Nov. 12.—Sixty-seven persons are known to have been killed and more than 100 seriously injured when the hurricane which inflicted heavy damage in Cuba struck Cayman Brac Island and the smaller island of Cayman.

These estimates of the casualties were reported to-day by the island commissioners, as soon as communication facilities with Kingston were restored.

The hurricane struck the two islands on Tuesday night with a wind which at times blew 100 miles an hour or more.

All the dwellings on Cayman Brac and Little Cayman were destroyed. The government here immediately sent help and prepared to ship building materials and additional food and medical supplies.

PROSPERITY AID IS HOOVER'S PROMISE
 Associated Press
 Washington, Nov. 12.—President Hoover broke his return journey to the White House to-day with a speech here pledging co-operation in efforts toward economic recovery. Speaking from the rear platform of his train, the Chief Executive said:

"I shall work for that unity during the remaining four months of this administration. Furthermore, it is our duty after the fourth of March to co-operate with our opponents in every sound measure for the restoration of prosperity."

Mr. Hoover declared he was returning to Washington from his home in Palo Alto, Calif. "In special concern that the measures and instrumentalities which we have in motion on an entirely non-partisan basis shall continue to function vigorously and contribute their utmost."

In the crowd at the train was a group of friends in Southern California who had asked the opportunity to greet him.

After the speech, Mr. and Mrs. Hoover drove to the new home of their son, Herbert Hoover Jr., at Sierra Madre, Mrs. Hoover had expressed a desire to stop to see the newly-built home.

Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Hoover Jr. and their three small children rode from Palo Alto on the special train. Allan Hoover, the president's younger son, also left the train here to return to his work in Los Angeles.

Republicans would not be discouraged by defeat, the President said, but should "abate not one bit of its confidence in Hoover, the rejected Republican president. It believes he has done all that any president could have done. The lack of confidence in the party and its group leadership was placed on those employed there."

PAPER TO BE INDEPENDENT
 Associated Press
 Portland, Nov. 12.—The Morning Oregonian, in a leading editorial to-day, announced it had become an independent Republican newspaper.

"It does not sever itself from allegiance to the Republican Party," the editorial said of the paper.

"It does decline hereafter to follow leadership or support candidates or measures on the sole ground they are Republican labeled."

Since its establishment more than seventeen years ago, the Oregonian has been a staunch Republican Party adherent. The editorial to-day submitted the belief that "the Republican party is more often sound and right than any other," but it added that "leadership in the Republican Party needs to reform itself."

"This newspaper," the editorial continued, "abates not one bit of its confidence in Hoover, the rejected Republican president. It believes he has done all that any president could have done. The lack of confidence in the party and its group leadership was placed on those employed there."

 Hon. J. W. Jones, Minister of Finance, has given close attention to the developments, as the treasury is vitally involved. It was pointed out that not only would an increase in the number of idle copper workers add to the total of unemployed maintenance costs, but a shutdown in a major industry would seriously curtail the government's tax income from the industry itself and the various direct and indirect taxes placed on those employed there."

HOT DOGS IN COLORS NOW

Associated Press
Chicago, Nov. 12.—Patriotic United States citizens may now procure "red hot" dogs and bologna in red, white and blue.

W. W. Woods, president of the Institute of American Meat Packers, said at the opening of its annual meeting here yesterday that sausage casings in a variety of hues had been developed. Thus, he pointed out, the fashionable dresser might satisfy his hunger with food matching his necktie or pleasantly complementing the shade of his hat.

Woods also disclosed beef steak and roast pork had weathered all assaults made on their popularity by diet fads and the depression and have maintained their sales.

Uncle Ray's Corner

A Little Saturday Talk

Before me, as I write, is a type-written letter from a girl who has something to tell us about raccoons. Dear Uncle Ray—We once had three raccoons. My father is a rural letter carrier and he found them on his route. We kept them in a large cage and fed them potatoes and meat. We named them Punch and Judy, and took a couple of pictures of them. They had beautiful fur. After we had them a good while, we sold them. I hope that "Punch and Judy" got along together better than the characters after whom they were named. At every Punch and Judy show I have seen there has been too much quarrelling.

The next letter in the pile on my table is from a boy who tells about a pet rabbit.

Dear Uncle Ray—My father is raising rabbits. Last winter, we had a black rabbit that became sick. We took the rabbit into our cellar, and when he recovered we let him run about. My mother named him Blackie. He would come to us and eat out of our hands. He became so tame that when we called him from the top of the stairs, he would hop all the way up.

We now have him in a hutch with other rabbits. We have about 125 rabbits. A true friend, Martin Little.

As a postscript to his interesting letter, Martin adds, "Please remember that I am always your friend." I am glad to have you say that, Martin. The friendships I have formed through our part of the paper are precious to me.

Another reader, Irene Goebel, writes to tell me that she has made a Corner scrapbook and adds: "I am circulating your stories to all those whom I think might not have read them or heard of them before." With such faithful members as Irene, it is no wonder that our Scrapbook club is still growing!

Still another reader, Betty Chambers, tells me that she was out of the city for some time and "missed several of the stories which my playmates have. I have read them through and have copied them in my handwriting for my scrapbook." She closes her letter with the words, "Your patron and friend."

FIGHT OPENS IN SAANICH

Election Campaign Gets Under Way at Tillicum School

C. H. French and J. Reid Announce Policies For Reeveship

A capacity audience at Tillicum School yesterday evening heard several candidates for municipal office in Saanich open their campaigns for election. The meeting was called by the Ward Seven Saanich Ratepayers' Association, and was notably cordial to all the speakers.

Prior to introducing the candidates, E. Wilkinson, president, brought forward a number of items of association business, among those being a report by J. Pickard, secretary, to the effect that the municipal council had refused to provide information requested. The meeting was greatly impressed at the council's refusal to express an opinion upon the propriety of Reeve Crouch having given a member of his own family municipal employment.

C. H. French, candidate for the reeve-ship, reviewed his career of forty-four years' service with the Hudson's Bay Company. "If you elect me as reeve I hope it will be by a clean-cut majority," he said, "I have devoted all my time to the duties of the office, the work being the sort of thing I like."

"I have been accustomed to supervising public work. What is the interior of a bridge-building, road-making and other work for the government. I had to keep many activities progressing and many men working together in harmony," Mr. French said.

He told of experiences in the Dease Lake district in 1914 and other incidents of his adventurous years in the interior.

John Reid, also a candidate for the reeve-ship, favored a system of recall of elected municipal officials; that all incomes above $2,500 yearly should be specially taxed to provide relief for workless; cancellation of water accounts in arrears; penalties on tax bills to be abolished; all direct relief to be paid in cash and regular staff of municipal workmen be replaced in their jobs.

Mr. Reid favored reorganization of the municipal office staff and reduction of all salaries above $100 monthly. He objected to collecting of old clothing for distribution to unemployed, believing it should have an issue of new goods. Mr. Reid also demanded abrogation of all debts owed by workless men or by farmers unable to sell their produce.

A great civilization was known by what it left behind, he said, and if the United States were destroyed as it stood to-day, the archaeologists of the future would dig into the ruins and find only, from bathtubs, that "we were a sanitary people" who erected masses of masonry, the component parts of which had no relation one to the other.

The architect attacked modern education as being productive of sterility and not culture.

engineering at the University of Wisconsin from 1894 to 1898.

W. H. Hadley, candidate for the council, said his entry was fulfillment of a long-standing desire to enter municipal affairs and that he had hoped that he would eventually occupy the reeve's chair. "If I go to the council, I go without strings, pledged only to use my best judgment and play a straight game," he said.

In regard to unemployment problems, the candidate said he believed the council should do somewhat more than its duty toward distressed families.

Tom L. Sargeant, also a candidate for the council, forecast the coming year would be hard for councilmen, as conditions were not getting better. He appealed for loyal support for those directing municipal and other public business. If elected he would oppose spending money on street work done until the needs of hungry families had been met. "We can walk in mud as long as we have shoes to walk in," he commented.

He favored a ward loan by-law covering a term of years as a means of raising funds for roadwork, and considered street lighting should also be improved by means of a special loan by-law.

Samuel Taylor said he had been mentioned as a prospective candidate, but as yet had made no definite decision. He was "waiting to see who entered the field."

The president expressed regrets that Councillor G. Stanley Eden was ill and unable to attend.

FINDS NOTHING GREAT IN U.S.

Frank Lloyd Wright, Famous Architect, Says Modern Education Produces Sterility

Associated Press
Providence, R.I., Nov. 12.—Striking out at the failure of the people of the United States to develop a culture which would force growth and development of architecture, Frank Lloyd Wright, internationally known architect, speaking at the Institute of Art, Brown University, yesterday ridiculed Yale University for its "foolish" perpetuation of modern architecture, and declared he did not understand how any young man would attend a university which had thus proclaimed its impotence to the generations to come.

A great civilization was known by what it left behind, he said, and if the United States were destroyed as it stood to-day, the archaeologists of the future would dig into the ruins and find only, from bathtubs, that "we were a sanitary people" who erected masses of masonry, the component parts of which had no relation one to the other.

WAR VETERAN ENDED HIS LIFE

Canadian Press
Halifax, Nov. 12.—While thousands bowed their heads yesterday in tribute to Canada's war dead, Private Thomas Joseph Farrelly, ragged and hungry, shuffled quietly to a waterfront wharf. A few minutes later, before the Citadel gun boomed out its salute, he joined the army of fallen heroes. Today the body lay in a local undertaking parlor, unclaimed.

Farrelly returned from Flanders fourteen years ago, a few months before the Armistice was signed. According to his discharge papers, he was "unfit for further service."

Life was not kind to him during the years that followed. He was not fit for much work, but he made a living somehow. Some months ago he became despondent and jumped into Bedford Basin.

Somebody dragged the veteran to shore, and his troubles began all over again. He wandered about the city, occasionally begging a night's lodging at the police station, until yesterday, when he slipped away from the crowd.

LITTLE BOY DIES IN FIRE

Marcel Dion, aged two, was suffocated when, frightened, he hid in his bedclothes. Edouard Dion, his father, and Louis Dion, his grandfather, were severely burned in attempting to rescue the child. The others injured were Jacqueline Dion, four, Napoleon Lafreniere and Ubald Laurent, the latter, two firemen.

SEEKING BASIS FOR SETTLEMENT

Japanese Minister to Canada Speaks of Japan-China Manchuria Problem

Canadian Press
Montreal, Nov. 12.—The complete problem must be solved on a basis of reality as opposed to theory and legal dogma," Hon. Iyemasa Tokugawa, Japanese Minister to Canada, told interviewers yesterday in explaining his country's attitude toward the League of Nations and the Lytton report. Mr. Tokugawa arrived here yesterday after conferences with representatives of Japan in Washington and New York.

The Lytton report, drawn up by a commission headed by Lord Lytton which investigated the Japanese-Chinese controversy over Manchuria at the request of the League of Nations, was believed correct "on many points," Mr. Tokugawa continued. "There are many statements, in the nature of comments, however, which we consider not only unsatisfactory but unfair," the minister said.

"The government and people of Japan have always been most faithful supporters of the League and would be the last to disregard the usefulness of the organization. The only thing in our minds is that the vital interests of the country and the actual circumstances must be clearly understood by the League and the world."

Oxford Students Sing Red Anthem

Oxford, Eng., Nov. 12.—Oxford University Communists started singing "the Internationale" at ceremonies before the War Memorial yesterday. Other spectators drowned them out with the National Anthem.

DUBLIN MOBS JOIN IN RIOTS

Republican Army Men and Police Clash in Streets

Canadian Press
Dublin, Irish Free State, Nov. 12.—Twenty persons were nursing injuries in hospitals to-day as the result of rioting here between Irish republican army men and police on Armistice evening.

The riot began apparently as a protest against the wearing of Armistice Day poppies. The young men, went about the downtown sections in military formations, singing songs early in the evening.

Later they approached Trinity College, police blocked their way, and the riot was on. Several store windows displaying poppies were smashed. Pedestrians found their lapel poppies snatched away, and many arrests were made.

BANNERS TORN UP BY SOLDIERS

Associated Press
Berkeley, Calif., Nov. 12.—This peace-loving community was disturbed by a bit of roughness yesterday when a group of demonstrators flaunted anti-military banners in the faces of soldiers and sailors entering the California Memorial Stadium for the annual Army-Navy football game.

One banner read: "Military football leads to military slaughter." The sailors and soldiers were filling by when the banners, in the hands of a group of six, appeared. The men broke ranks and seized the banners and tore them up, while police ushered the three boys and three girls, four of them university students, to safety. They were held pending posting of a $25 bond for each.

FOUR NAZIS ARE SENT TO PRISON

Schweidnitz, Germany, Nov. 12.—Edmund Heines, Nazi member of the Reichstag and chief of the Hitler storm troops in Silesia, yesterday was sentenced to six months in prison in connection with a bombing last summer. His adjutant was sentenced to four months in jail, one storm trooper was condemned to five years in the penitentiary, and another received a one-year sentence for attempted assassination.

Associated Press
Lewisburg, Pa., Nov. 12.—One of the world's most modern prisons—where life of confinement will be largely what the prisoners choose to make it—was opened by the United States government for inspection yesterday. Barred cells for the hardened, habitual criminals are in the institution, erected at a cost of $3,500,000, but they are few. Most of the prisoners, who will come from a dozen eastern states, will find a new type of prison quarters awaiting them.

Trees, Shrubs And Climbers

By JOHN HUTCHISON, F.R.H.S.

Trees and shrubs are essential to any garden, large or small, but, in choosing them, it is necessary to use discretion. The deciding factor as to what shrubs to use and how many is the size of the garden.

It is only in a large garden that a great number of trees can be grown. In a limited space shrubs should be used chiefly, and only a few specimen trees introduced in specially-selected spots.

For specimen trees in small gardens nothing can be better than the various crabs, plums and cherries, for they are among the best flowering trees and at the same time are not likely to become too large. There are so many kinds of flowering crabs, plums and cherries in cultivation to-day that one has a very large choice of material.

In the smaller garden it is to shrubs, however, that one must turn for general planting. They may be border in a border or shrubbery, or they may be used in small clumps, when they serve much the same purpose as the specimen trees and can be of great assistance in improving a vista or cutting out undesirable objects. In a small shrubbery of mixture of kinds will generally be desired, in order to have a considerable variety of plants, but in clumps, a better effect will be served if each clump consists of one variety only.

SPRING BLOOM

For use in clumps near the lawn the most effective shrubs are those that flower in the spring. Lilacs are suitable for this purpose, as are the Deutzias, Philadelphus or Mock Orange, and the Forsythias. The Berberis are splendid grown in this way and show their flowers and, later on, their berries to great advantage.

Both evergreen and deciduous shrubs must be used in the shrubbery, so that it shall not lack interest in the winter months. Among suitable evergreens there are the evergreen berberis, the evergreen cotoneaster, euonymus in many sorts, and dwarf conifers in many shades of green. These, carefully planted with restraint among the flowering shrubs, will make a shrubbery that will never be lacking in interest.

CHOICE OF SOIL

Separate mention must be made of rhododendrons, azaleas and the heathers, which should have a place provided from them with soil that is absolutely lime-free and which, in addition, has been enriched by the addition of peat and leaf mould.

Turning now to climbing plants, with their help, the barest places may be draped with green and in many cases studded with bloom. Even if there were no other climbers than the common ivy and the Virginia creeper, there would be much for which to be grateful, yet it is a fact that both of these are often used to the exclusion of more suitable subjects.

When thinking of climbers, one naturally thinks of the unalterable parts of the garden, the walls and fences. For the walls there is a wide selection from which to choose. Roses can be chosen for any aspect, clematis of various kinds, wisteria, jasmine, honeysuckle, and many others.

Many shrubs which are not really climbers are suitable for training against walls and fences. Pyrus japonica, (the Japanese quince), Pyracantha (the fire thorn), many of the cotoneasters are all useful subjects for the purpose.

FOR PERGOLAS

Pergolas, arches and summer houses all form useful supports for rampant climbers, provided their presence is otherwise justified. Many of the more rampant clematis, such as Montana and vitalba, may be used to advantage, as well as the stronger-growing of the climbing roses.

Whatever the object in view may be, it is essential that any climber shall have plenty of growth. If this fact is remembered, better results will be obtained. Climbing plants must have a good start. The ground should be deeply dug and well enriched and a timber should be given to the master of drainage if the land is in the least inclined to become water-logged.

When a climber is to ascend a growing tree, it is a good plan to bury half a barrel, open at both ends, up to its rim a few feet from the tree and fill it with prepared soil. By planting the climber in this a good start is ensured before there is any competition with the roots of the tree. The barrel will rot away in due time, but not until the climber has been put on even terms with the tree.

CRASH-JINX FOLLOWS RUTH NICHOLS

Miss Ruth Nichols, prominent New York aviatrix who has figured in two serious plane crashes since her transatlantic flight attempt last year, had another narrow escape from death when her craft cracked up, as pictured here, at Floyd Bennett Field. Carrying political campaign literature on a projected transcontinental flight sponsored by the Republican National Committee, the plane had just left the ground when it fell back heavily, crumpling the landing gear. Miss Nichols was unhurt.

"Great Moments in a Young Man's Life" Series By Rev. E. F. Church at Metropolitan

In these sermons the Metropolitan pastor is trying to give very useful and much-needed guidance to young men on subjects that affect the whole area of his life. They are delicate and difficult to deal with in places, but with a scriptural frankness and a desire to redeem youth from mistakes that are fatal, these subjects can and will be a blessing to many.

Church Of Medieval Fame "Lost" In Heart Of London

The Church of St. Ethelburga, one of the oldest in London, is almost lost in the business district which surrounds it. Here you see the church, with modern shops concealing the lower half. Shops have been built across the front of St. Ethelburga since 1570.

London, Oct. 12.—Almost lost in the heart of the great business section which surrounds it on every side in Bishopsgate, the Church of St. Ethelburga is one of the few authentic bits of medieval London which has survived the passage of time.

It was built so long ago—sometime during the early years of the thirteenth century—that little of its early history is recorded. The church was named after Ethelburga, the famous abbess of Barking, whose father was Ethelbert, king of Kent. Money for building the church was raised by the abbess.

Old records show that the church was once one of the richest in England. Gold, silver, marble and alabaster ornaments decorated the interior, but almost all of its riches have been lost or destroyed during the past 700 years.

For one thing, many of its valued possessions were sold at intervals in order to pay the cost of expensive repairs.

The reputed wealth of the church was such as to attract the attention of King Henry VIII, however, but he made his demands too late. The bulk of the treasure had already been sold to rebuild the roof, according to an ancient document, "as it rained in the church." The church was then in a state of ruin and the famous brass plaque erected to the memory of W. Williams, sword bearer to fifty-two lord mayors of London, has been lost.

In 1666 the Great Fire which swept London left the Church of St. Ethelburga intact. It was one of the few buildings to survive that disaster.

The custom of permitting shops to be built across the front of the church, which was started in 1567 in an effort to raise money, still continues. With larger buildings on either side as well, St. Ethelburga is almost lost from sight.

SAYS REVOLT IS HERE NOW

"No revolution is coming—it is already here," will be the thesis advanced by Dr. Clem Davies to-morrow evening at the City Temple, in the course of an address on "British Columbia's Problems—A Solution."

Dr. Davies has announced that he will have some sweeping recommendations to make, being of the opinion that the revolution now in progress presages greater changes than those which have taken place in recent years in Russia. "Even though it has not been ushered in by violence, nevertheless this is revolution and the sooner it is so recognized and given right direction, the sooner will many of Canada's ills be corrected," Dr. Davies will declare.

Remembrance Day will be observed at the morning service, when arrangements will be in charge of the Young People's Society. Short addresses to be given by young people will feature the outlook of youth upon present world conditions. Special instrumental and vocal music will be presented.

The evening anthem will be Woodward's "The Radiant Morn." Miss Mona Radford will sing "Come Unto Me" (Coenen).

LONDON CALLS FINE PREACHER

Dr. Campbell Morgan to Return From United States in December

London, Nov. 12.—Dr. Hubert L. Simpson has announced at Westminster Congregational Church, Buckingham Gate, S.W., that Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, the famous preacher, has accepted an invitation to return from America to be associated with him in the work of the church.

Dr. Campbell Morgan, who was for thirteen years minister of the church, went to the United States in 1919 as lecturer and preacher. He has been described as "a wizard in the pulpit," and men and women of all ages and ranks have been captivated by his preaching.

In 1928 he returned to England to fulfill a three-months' Sunday ministry at Westminster Church, which was an outstanding success.

The charm of his preaching consisted of a fine voice and presence, an exhaustive knowledge of the Bible, and a picturesque style which makes an insistent appeal to the hearer. Yet, like Spurgeon, the great Baptist preacher of the second half of the last century

He studies modern life at the theatre, and rushes round the country in a motor car fulfilling one engagement after another.

VICTORIAN WEDS SOUTHERN GIRL

Mr. Robert G. Fowler Married in Oakland, Cal., to Miss Virginia Purington

A wedding of much interest to Victoria friends of the bridegroom was solemnized at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. L. S. Purington, Oakland, California, at 9 o'clock on the evening of Friday, October 28, when their eldest daughter, Virginia, was united in marriage to Robert George Fowler, eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Fowler, Rosebery Avenue, Victoria.

The reception rooms were beautifully arranged with masses of autumn flowers and the ceremony was performed by Rev. J. P. Orr, pastor of the Congregational Church. Given in marriage by her father, the bride entered the drawing-room to the strains of the Bridal Chorus from "Lohengrin," played by Miss Lois Ganster. The bride was a charming picture in her gown of beige lace and georgette, made on Colonial lines, with a long, full skirt, the bodice finished with a Vandyke collar of the lace, and elbow-length puff-sleeves of the lace. She carried a Colonial bouquet of talliesman roses.

Miss Ethel Purington was her sister, only attendant, wearing a lovely rock of white georgette, grided at the waistline with transparent velvet in shades of palest pink and green, and carrying a bouquet of yellow roses. Mr. Harry Sherratt, cousin of the groom, was the groomsmen.

Following the ceremony a reception was held. Mrs. Purington receiving the guests in a smart frock of brown georgette and beige lace, assisted by the bridegroom's mother, Mrs. J. S. Fowler, of Victoria, handsomely gowned in black lace, relieved with lace in a cafe-au-lait shade. Supper was served at a table centred with the bride's cake and adorned with autumn flowers and matching tapers in silver candlesticks. Speeches of congratulation to the young couple being voiced by Rev. J. P. Orr, Harry Sherratt, N. W. Gribble and Ben Warner.

During the reception a musical programme included piano selections by two radio artists, Frank Sabello and Det. Heslip, piano numbers by Miss Lois Ganster, and songs by Mrs. J. S. Fowler. The many beautiful gifts included the deed of a new bungalow in Oakland, the gift of the bride's grandfather, J. W. Bussey. Mr. and Mrs. Fowler are residing at the Richmond Apartments, Oakland, pending the completion of their new home.

The recent innovation of bridge tables at the Empress Hotel is proving popular one, many small parties of four or more players of bridge and shah jong enjoying the facilities for a quiet game and tea in the delightful atmosphere of the palm room. This feature was started only on Monday last and during the week a number of hostesses arranged tables, while it is also proving a popular medium for the holding of inexpensive "no-host" parties. Mrs. H. B. Jackson, the social hostess, is in charge of reservations, and one or more tables may be reserved by telephoning to her at the hotel.

Mr. and Mrs. A. E. Ormond, entertained at a farewell party at their home on Quebec Street yesterday evening in honor of their son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Wilbur Dawson, who will leave on Sunday evening for Prince Rupert to make their home.

For the happy occasion the church had been beautifully decorated with flowers by Mrs. C. H. Smith. Mrs. R. M. Phillips and Mrs. A. G. E. Munson, white chrysanthemums and ferns being arranged over the chancel screen, while baskets of pale apricot and pink chrysanthemums were placed along the window ledges and on the pulpit. On the altar were vases of large mauve and white chrysanthemums, and palms were placed at either side of the chancel step.

PRETTY BRIDE

Given in marriage by her father, the bride made a fascinating picture in her wedding gown of white flat crepe fashioned with simplicity. The semi-fitted bodice merged into the long full skirt, and had long sleeves of white georgette, puffed at the shoulders. The neckline was finished with a cowl collar of chiffon, and a band of the material encircled the waistline, caught with a diamante buckle. An exquisite Honiton lace wedding veil, worn by the bride's paternal great-grandmother, was arranged on her head in cap-shape, and held in place with a half-circle of orange blossoms at the nape of the neck, falling in soft folds to form a short train. She carried a sheaf of white chrysanthemums, and a white veil-bound prayerbook.

There were two attendants, Mrs. R. M. Phillips, as matron of honor, and Mrs. Dorothy Tremayne, as bridesmaid. They were gowned alike in frocks of gold satin with which they wore short brown velvet capes and turbans of brown net and panne velvet, finished with nose veils. They carried sheaves of bronze chrysanthemums. The groom was supported by Mr. R. M. Phillips, and the ushers were Messrs. Horace Goad and Frank McMullin, brother of the bride.

BIG RECEPTION

Following the ceremony at the church a reception was held at the home of the bride's father, 37 Beach Drive, where Miss McMullin, aunt of the bride, and Mrs. Ellis assisted in receiving the many guests. Miss McMullin wore a becoming gown of zirconium figured in shades of blue and palest green, with black hat trimmed with blue velvet, and Mrs. Ellis was smart in imperial blue georgette and lace with a velour hat to match, trimmed with a band of blue velvet. The young couple received the felicitations of their friends in the drawing-room before the fireplace, which was banked with chrysanthemums in bronze and yellow shades and ferns. Pale pink and white was the color motif of the decorations of the supper table in the dining-room, the handsome three-tier wedding cake occupying the place of honor on the bride's table. Assisting in serving were the Misses Peggy Pressey, Connie Elford, K. Hart, Eileen Wilson, Elsie Johnson and Doris Brown. Two little cousins of the bride, Master Ralph and Miss Mary Worley, opened the door on the arrival of the guests at the reception.

HANDSOME GIFTS

Mr. and Mrs. Ellis left on the midnight boat for the mainland, and on their return to Vancouver Island will make their home at Courtenay, where the groom is on the staff of the Provincial Police. For traveling the bride wore a smart frock of wine-colored crepe-back satin with shoulder cape and a close-fitting felt hat to match, and a Lisamovel lawn coat.

Among the many handsome wedding gifts were a silver tray from the officer-commanding a division and N.C.O.'s and members of a division Provincial Police, and a silver tea service from the staff of the office of the assessor and collector of customs, the Provincial Parliament Buildings, of which the bride has been a member for the last five years. A happy little touch to this gift was a list of the names of the members of staff printed on the streamers of a bow of white ribbon tied to the teapot.

MISS DOROTHY TREMAYNE

Miss Tremayne, eldest daughter of Dr. and Mrs. H. E. Tremayne of William Head, was bridesmaid at the Ellis-McMullin nuptials yesterday evening.

POPULAR YOUNG COUPLE WED AT ST. MATTHIAS CHURCH

Miss Constance Winonah McMullin, Daughter of Provincial Police Commissioner, Becomes Bride of Mr. William Geoffrey Ellis of Courtenay; Reception Held Following Ceremony

The little church of St. Matthias, Foal Bay, was filled with guests yesterday evening for the marriage of Constance Winonah, daughter of Lieutenant-Colonel J. H. McMullin, Commissioner of Provincial Police, and the late Mrs. McMullin, and Mr. William Geoffrey Ellis, eldest son of Captain and Mrs. William Ellis, Seacroft Apartments, Oak Bay. Rev. A. G. E. Munson performed the wedding ceremony and the organist, Mrs. Colin Cunnison played the wedding marches on the arrival and departure of the wedding party and an organ solo during the signing of the register. The hymn sung was "O Perfect Love."

For the happy occasion the church had been beautifully decorated with flowers by Mrs. C. H. Smith. Mrs. R. M. Phillips and Mrs. A. G. E. Munson, white chrysanthemums and ferns being arranged over the chancel screen, while baskets of pale apricot and pink chrysanthemums were placed along the window ledges and on the pulpit. On the altar were vases of large mauve and white chrysanthemums, and palms were placed at either side of the chancel step.

PRETTY BRIDE

Given in marriage by her father, the bride made a fascinating picture in her wedding gown of white flat crepe fashioned with simplicity. The semi-fitted bodice merged into the long full skirt, and had long sleeves of white georgette, puffed at the shoulders. The neckline was finished with a cowl collar of chiffon, and a band of the material encircled the waistline, caught with a diamante buckle. An exquisite Honiton lace wedding veil, worn by the bride's paternal great-grandmother, was arranged on her head in cap-shape, and held in place with a half-circle of orange blossoms at the nape of the neck, falling in soft folds to form a short train. She carried a sheaf of white chrysanthemums, and a white veil-bound prayerbook.

There were two attendants, Mrs. R. M. Phillips, as matron of honor, and Mrs. Dorothy Tremayne, as bridesmaid. They were gowned alike in frocks of gold satin with which they wore short brown velvet capes and turbans of brown net and panne velvet, finished with nose veils. They carried sheaves of bronze chrysanthemums. The groom was supported by Mr. R. M. Phillips, and the ushers were Messrs. Horace Goad and Frank McMullin, brother of the bride.

BIG RECEPTION

WEDS GRANDSON OF ROCKEFELLER

Miss Blanchette F. Hooker
Bride of John D. Rockefeller, 3rd

Associated Press
New York, Nov. 12.—In a setting dominated by six tall cedar trees and a cedar hedge, Miss Blanchette Perry Hooker, youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Leon Huntington Hooker of Greenwich, Conn., became the bride yesterday of John D. Rockefeller 3rd. The wedding took place in the Riverside Church, with the pastor, Rev. Harry Emerson Fosdick, performing the ceremony.

The bridal party was made up of twenty-two relatives and friends of the two principals.

The same note of simplicity which marked the decorations of the church was also carried out at the Colony Club ballroom, where a reception was held. There the bride received before a background of cedar trees and two trees of white chrysanthemums.

Young Rockefeller, grandson of the founder of the oil fortune, is twenty-six. He is attending Browning School in New York City, was graduated from Loomis School in Windsor, Conn., in 1925, and from Princeton University in 1929. He is an employee in his father's office.

Miss Hooker is twenty-three. She was graduated from Vassar in 1931 and was a debutante in the winter of 1927-28. She has been active in work of the Junior League.

Her father is a civil engineer, a former deputy superintendent of public works when Theodore Roosevelt was governor of New York and a past president of the Manufacturing Chemists' Association of the United States.

LAST MINUTE BEDTIME
ATTENTIONS

Mama, I want a drink of water. Mama, what's that noise? Mama, I have to go to the toilet. Mama, I dolly fell on the floor. All of us who have been mothers and have put our young hopefuls to bed with a sigh of relief know the irritation of those requests coming from the upper regions. There is nothing so longed for by the tired mother, after her flock is safely tucked away, than perfect peace and absolute quiet. She somehow pulls herself up to this final hour of the day and like a taut spring can not stand one additional tug without snapping.

HARD ON PARENTS
Children demand all the attention they can get so long as they can get it. If mother goes quickly and agreeably and fulfills their requests, they add more to them. They dislike to be left alone to lie quietly until sleep descends upon them. As a result, they keep themselves awake by standing up and concocting excuses for the parent to make them just one more visit.

As most mothers discover, too much attention simply breeds more requests. All parents are reasonable enough to provide enough water, enough bathroom attention, sufficient covers, a light if necessary so that the child feels secure and comfortable. But to continue the practice of trotting back again and again, whether it is the father or the mother, does not help the child and subtracts from the rest and quiet which any mother needs just as badly as her child.

OMIT NAP
Sometimes, if it is plain that the child is really not sleepy, it is better to shorten or even omit the afternoon nap. Mothers who test this out usually find that the child is sleepy enough at bedtime, but is also terribly cross at suppertime. It is time if a child can take a nap right after lunch, clear up to the school days. But it is also desirable that there be no time wasted in getting to sleep at night. If the length of the nap is spoiling the child's desire to go to sleep promptly, it is better to sacrifice the nap. Let the child have a rest in bed after lunch with toys and quiet. If he goes to sleep, the mother should go in his room at 2 or not later than 3 p.m. and indulge in sufficient activity to weaken the child.

NECESSARY ATTENTIONS
Bedtime should not be later than 7 or 7.30 for the child under five years of age. Use a sleeping bag, whenever possible, as this discourages the child from standing up, a practice that prolongs his capering even when the child is ready for bed. Give the child every necessary attention. Leave on a light if the child feels afraid as many of them profess to be at about this age. Give the child some favorite toy which should be held quietly so that the toy may go to sleep quickly. By subtle means insure that the child is sleepy, that he has not too much freedom to move about or stand up, and then give him an obvious reason—not because he has to go to sleep but perhaps the doll's sleeping and why he should lie speechless and quiet.

"GERM-RESISTANCE"

Without It Human Race Would Have Been Destroyed, Doctor Says

By DR. MORRIS FISHBEIN

It has been estimated that 50 per cent of all of the diseases about which medicine knows most are caused by attacks on the human body by germs capable of causing disease. If one includes all of the diseases which represent complications and after-effects of infections of the human body, the percentage is probably much greater.

Students of infection are inclined to include four factors as chiefly responsible for infection of the body: First, the presence of a germ with sufficient toxic power to grow in the body; second, a sufficient number of germs to overcome attacks by the body against the germ; third, some special condition in the body that makes it possible for the germ to live and grow; and fourth, some method of getting the germ into the body.

Were it not for the fact that human beings develop within their bodies conditions which make it difficult for germs to live and grow, the human race would long since have been destroyed by the bacteria.

However, the resistance which the human being has because of these conditions is not absolute. In the first place, the condition of the human being changes from time to time, and there is evidence that resistance is decreased when the body is greatly undernourished, or when a person is exceedingly fatigued, or when he has been exposed to sudden severe changes of temperature, or in several other ways.

Therefore, the line of defence varies in its strength from time to time and when the enemy is sufficiently numerous, or sufficiently strong, it breaks through.

For this reason, even in the most severe epidemics, some people escape although there are conditions in which

GREAT BANKER NOT PESSIMIST

Exactly What Montague Norman Did Say at London Dinner is Received Here

Verbatim Report Lacks Alarm of Some Sensational Cabled Summaries

Exactly what Montagu Norman, Governor of the Bank of England, did say in his address to the bankers at the Lord Mayor's Mansion House dinner in London on October 30, has been received here by Robin Piers in the verbatim report of "The London Times." The complete text of the address, Mr. Piers pointed out, yields a somewhat different meaning from the sensationalized summary and headlines carried by some newspapers. The report which was not that of the Canadian Press or Associated Press.

"The Times of London" quotes Mr. Norman as follows: "I wish to put before you one or two thoughts to which I feel the mind of those who live and move about this narrow city may direct themselves. They are not questions of day-to-day or tomorrow or next week. They are ultimate questions which eventually will need consideration and action. There are many questions which may arise in the future and which it is better to be decided by common consent among us."

FROZEN CREDITS

"Obviously one of the great things of which we are speaking technically, is the question of frozen credits throughout Europe. I think there is nothing which impedes the business and prospects of bankers to the same extent as those of today. It is to be achieved I do not know; but I believe what I have been told, that trade will find its way in almost any direction over or round almost any tariff barrier by reason of the fact that the bankers' credit in many countries is frozen up and the exchange opportunities in those countries are not available, men trade with those countries, as I have seen, is extremely difficult."

"There is another point to which we ought to direct our attention. In the past by tradition, by reason of our means and ability, we were great lenders. Lending here was practically indiscriminate. It was merely competitive. Can that continue with the same freedom? The future? The time will come when great opportunities for investment, speculative business included will be offered in several places, east and west. It has happened before. It will happen again. What we need, and shall need, when that time arrives is a robust and rational industrial and commerce which can offer the same attractions by way of investment as will assuredly be offered in those other countries. I look forward in the near future to a rapid development and improvement in the industry of this country upon which in large measure the business of bankers and merchants depends, upon which we can rebuild the eminence which we enjoyed and received from our fathers."

LIGHT IN SIGHT

"Another point I wish to mention. It is rather technical, but it refers to the question of bankers, many of whom I see around me, who have been largely overseas. They have to my knowledge been generous lenders on short credit overseas. They have done this each for himself and without any co-operation or any knowledge by one of us what others are doing. The result has been that in many instances, some of which have come before me, we have been able to borrow on short credit sums, which had the previous lenders been aware of it, would have been quite out of the question, and which have come as a surprise to all of us in this country and abroad. Now I wonder whether that cannot be done in future upon some basis of co-operation to the interests of all. There are committees of various kinds, one of which in particular comprises the bankers to whom I allude, and I believe that the interests of all would be served if the method of co-operation could be considered in some way among them in regard to their future business."

"For most of us 'One step enough for me.' That is as far as 'oh the whole, I can see. The difficulties are so vast, that the future is so uncertain, and precedents are so many, that I approach this whole subject not only in ignorance, but in humility. It is too great for me. I am willing to do my best."

"And when it comes to the future, I hope that we may all see and approach the light at the end of the tunnel which some are already able to point out to us. We have not yet emerged from the difficulties through which we have been passing. I like to believe that we shall meet again next year, that this will continue to be an annual gathering, and that then, as we see clearly where we are going, we shall be sensible of the rapid pace towards that goal at which we are proceeding."

WILL SPEAK ON DANGER POINTS

Canadian Club to Hear Distinguished Intelligence Officer November 25

Many Luncheons of Interest Arranged For Clubs Here Next Week

Although without a speaker for next week, the men's Canadian Club has made arrangements for an address which promises to be of outstanding interest, a week from next Friday, when Capt. H. G. ## RELIEF CHEQUE SENT TO CITY

Government's Account to End of June Paid; Tax Dispute Not Settled

Victoria's relief account with the Provincial Government was settled up to the end of June, this morning with receipt of a cheque for $20,649.46 from Hon. J. W. Jones, Minister of Finance. The government is still in debt to the city to the extent of $20,000 or so, 000 for accounts since that time and the Minister of Finance says he is anxious to expedite settlement of these claims, in a letter to the city.

Delay has been occasioned by a dispute over allowances given by the city for water and taxes, the government claiming nothing should be given for these items. The city has paid out considerable sums on this account, however, holding that for health reasons water must be provided and that the Chamber of Deputies is pending special session learned to-day.

Detroit Red Wings Pull Fast One as N.H.L. Season Opens

Jack Adams' Club Must Now Be Figured as Title Threat

All Teams Appear to Have Chance of Getting Into Finals

SIX TEAMS of the National Hockey League swung into action on Thursday evening, and the remainder will come under fire for the first time to-night and to-morrow evening. The opening battles failed to produce much excitement outside of the surprising victory of the Detroit Red Wings over Chicago's Black Hawks. The Red Wings, with a revamped lineup, including several youngsters from the former American Association, were not rated powerful enough to subdue the speedy Hawks. By their success, the Detroit club looms as a threat for the league honors. The New York Rangers, as usual, won their first game, while Boston and Toronto showed little in their 1-to-1 deadlock.

After looking over all the clubs in the league it begins to look like a keen fight will be seen before the Stanley Cup finds a resting place for this season. Toronto Maple Leafs have the championship and are vying with the boys who are going to do with it. They still have the "kid line" and Connie Smythe has a kidding line in reserve, which should be helpful in the real milking starts. Dick Irvin, the eminent pigeon fancier, claims he has no homers in his squad, and is vying with the boys who are going to do with it. Leafs are wondering who they will have to oppose in the finals, which is a question the Leafs look great on paper and has all the earmarks of a good squad.

With Eddie Lohme as coach, Montreal Canadiens should be "out in" as well as "sane doubt." Those sturdy descendants of the old regime, such as Burke, Hainsworth, McGarvey, and Morin, are still flitting along with the rest of the Flying Frenchmen, who are the last word when it comes to fast, fitting, and effective play. They again take the controls, and have threatened to set the managerial pace by adding a cane to his sartorial equipment. When asked to answer without consulting his attorney, but already the rumor has caused the other master minds to devise sartorial countermeasures. While Cy Denneny has come out manfully for a "kitt" bar the door policy.

Now that the "ballyhoos" for Smith has subsided, and he is back to normal again, Maroons' chances are on the up and up. Plenty depends on how the new men make out. On the other hand, if they get properly introduced to the opposition defences, their prospects will brighten. The team is well geared for offensive play, and should have a lot more holds than last year. In case of legal action they can rush Hughie Flett into the breach, where he should be a real terror. The boys are headed for a big year provided Trainer Bill O'Brien manages to keep his figure, which shows a tendency to get out of bounds at present.

New York Rangers climbed the highest mountains at Lake Placid in preparation for their climb to the top. Rangers still have the Cooke, the flip-flop forwards. How Rangers will do is problematical. Detroit is determined to have a bird of a team, having changed their line-up from the old Red Wings. They may miss Noble, but on the hand it looks all even, as Noble is liable to miss them. Jack Adams has a lot of men to choose from. At present he is sorting out the mixture left on his doorstep by the affiliation of the Chicago Shamblers with Detroit. The process looks a bit involved, according to early indications, but Jack has been tackling weighty problems for the past ten years, so one more should not beat down too heavily.

Boston's prospects are pretty good. If they don't finish last, they might finish first, when the final settlement is made. They have added Stewart, Lamb and Burch, subtracted Welland, a move they hope will multiply customers while bringing them a big division of the spoils. Boston expects to charge through to the Stanley Cup. Stewart will bring them power, and by the end of the season the whole squad should be able to figure out their own parlay, as well as the chart forms, without missing a trick. The team expects to make Lamb-Stew out of the opposition. Taken by and by, as well as on the bias, Bruins look to have the credentials. With that line-up their favorite play should have more power than Niagara.

Chicago Black Hawks have added a flock of maseurs, three sets of dumbbells to go with their present equipment, two new blackboards as well as quicker telegraphic communication to reinforce the battery of telephones leading from the bench to the front office. Emil Iverson, whose astonishing record of two seasons of active service as manager is the talk of the circuit, is still manager. Emil expects to consolidate his position by the addition of a weighing scale, along with a mechanical horse.

His great effort will be to make Tuffy Abel fit into an upper berth, an intricate bit of strategy which has so far eluded most of the master minds who have handled the Hawks. None of his predecessors have been able to complete the intriguing task. Taken from consomme to coffee, Hawk's prospects are as bright as usual.

Crowd of 1,500 As Squads Battle To Tie In First Game

Highlanders, City Senior Rugby Champions, Demoralized by Play of Fifth Brigade When Teams Fight to Scoreless Draw in Opening Match of English Code Season Here; Army Game Fails to Decide Winner of Fordham Johnson Cup; Ceremonies Feature Premier Clash of Year

A demoralizing kick-and-run game by the entire Fifth Brigade team and a scintillating performance by Roddy McInnes, Gunners sterling fullback, coupled with smart tackling by the artillerymen, robbed the Canadian Scottish of victory in the first English rugby game of the season, as the squads battled on a greasy field with a slippery ball to a scoreless draw in the Army game at the Royal Athletic Park yesterday. Whether a play-off for the Fordham Johnson cup will be staged or whether the militia units will share the trophy this year has not been decided yet.

Approximately 1,500 enthusiastic spectators packed the grandstand and overflowed onto the field to see the battle and novelties provided by the two regiments for the fixture.

It was a hard game for the Scottish, who had a slight edge virtually all through the encounter, but failed to put in the necessary finish to score. Three or four times they came within an ace of gaining points, notably when Campbell's place kick grazed the bar towards the end of the first half and when the later broke away but was grounded by McInnes in the last minute of play.

WESTS TAKE THIRD PLACE

Defeat Victoria City 5 to 0 in First Division Coast League Soccer Match

Scoring a 5-to-0 victory over Victoria City yesterday afternoon at the Heywood Avenue grounds, the Victoria West eleven jumped out of the cellar position in the first division of the Victoria Coast Football League. The Wests are now in third place, three points in the rear of Esquimalt, while the City occupy last place, one point behind the greenhorns. The Wests had a decided edge on the play and, after gaining a four-goal lead in the first half, were never in danger.

This was the only football fixture played yesterday, the two Wednesday League matches being called off owing to the clubs being unable to field teams.

The match at Heywood Avenue took place on a slippery pitch, which resulted in many plays being spoiled by the players being unable to secure firm footing. The forward line of the Wests turned in a smart exhibition, their shooting and passing being good. Chalmers, City's goal, had an off day and at least three of the five goals might have been saved.

Ten minutes after the opening whistle the Wests went into the lead when Borden, centre-forward, headed in a fine centre from Gibbons, left-winger. Halfway through the half the Wests went two goals up, Gibbons cutting in from left wing to beat Chalmers with a bullet drive to the top of the net.

NANJO SINGH BEATS SPARKS

Hindu Heavyweight Wins Feature Bout on Pacific Stadiums Wrestling Card

In the double main event staged on the wrestling card of the Pacific Stadiums yesterday evening Nanjo Singh, Hindu heavyweight, defeated Al Sparks, Salt Lake City, two falls to one, and "Bull" Brentens, Chicago, won from Joe Gardner, two falls out of three. In the local preliminary Lyon Fenlon and Reg. Hopkins battled to a one-fall draw.

The bout between Singh and Sparks saw the former take the opening fall in the third round with a body press, following a series of elbow butts. Knocking the Hindu down with a flying scissor in the fourth, Sparks succeeded in getting the tying fall. Failing back on his opponent after he had secured a flying body scissor, Singh took the third and winning fall in the fifth.

In the Brentens-Gardner bout the Chicago grappler gained the first fall in the second round with a flying head kick. A flying-mare and body press gave Gardner the tying fall in the fourth. In the fifth round Brentens caught Gardner in the stomach with both feet as he tried a flying head-kick, and knocked him out, following which he fell on him for the winning fall.

Frankie Battaglia Wins By Knockout

Sensational Winnipeg Middleweight Has Bout With Terry Halted in Seventh

Has Trenton Youngster Continually on Canvas; Barney Ross Decisions Hess

Chicago, Nov. 12.—Frankie Battaglia, Winnipeg's heavy-fisted middleweight, hammered out a technical knockout victory over "Young" Terry, Trenton, N.J., in the seventh round of a ten-rounder at the Chicago Stadium yesterday evening.

Battaglia needed little time to demonstrate his superiority, flooring Terry three times in the first round, twice for counts of nine.

The end came after 1 minute 40 seconds of the seventh, after a left hook had dropped Terry for an eight count. The Trenton youngster was badly hurt and Referee Johnny Behr stopped the bout, awarding the victory to Battaglia.

Battaglia cut loose with his right in the first round, knocking Terry down twice, another right dropped him to one knee for no count and still another bounced him off the ropes. Terry came back strong and managed to hold Battaglia even in the second and even outslugged the Canadian in the third.

BATTLES TERRY

But Battaglia took charge again in the fourth, and with the exception of a brief flurry in the fifth, steadily battered Terry. A right uppercut caught Terry on the chin in the sixth and he went down. He managed to rise at the count of nine, but he was easy prey for Battaglia in the seventh.

After almost knocking Terry out with right-hand socks in the first, the Winnipeg aspirant for the middleweight crown quit using the right until the sixth. He concentrated on left hooks in other rounds, with fair success.

The Winnipeg youth boxed more cleverly than in previous Chicago engagements, and had little difficulty blocking or stopping Terry's wild swings.

ROSS WHIPS HESS

Barney Ross, Chicago youngster, clamoring for a championship engagement with Tony Campionieri, decisively defeated Goldie Hess, Los Angeles, in their ten-round preliminary to the Battaglia-Terry scrap.

Ross missed a chance to knock out Hess in the third round when he had him rocking on his heels from lefts and right-hand punches to the chin. Hess clung to the top rope of the ring to support himself.

At the close of the game the Lieutenant-Governor was introduced to the different players lined up on the side.

New York Rangers Renew Feud With Toronto To-night

Last Year's Stanley Cup Finalists Clash For First Time in This Year's N.H.L. Campaign at Toronto; Lester Patrick's Squad Strengthened by Return of Frank Boucher; Rugged Boston Bruins Will Engage Canadiens at Montreal; Ottawa Makes Return Against Maroons

Feature of four week-end National Hockey League clashes, New York Rangers, fresh from a 4 to 2 opening-game victory over Montreal Maroons, engage the Toronto Maple Leafs to-night in a renewal of last spring's Stanley Cup finals.

While Rangers and the Leafs are battling, Boston Bruins, with one tie-game behind them, tackle the colorful Montreal Canadiens in the first game of the season for the habitants. And Cy Denneny's rebuilt Ottawa Senators open with Montreal Maroons as their opponents in the first N.H.L. game since the 1930-31 season.

The Stanley Cup holders, never at their best in the opening game, yet did better this season than for several past, when they emerged with a tie. For the last two seasons they have lost their opening game.

Rangers showed a well-trained machine in winning from the powerful Maroons on Montreal ice and served warning they were prepared to carry on with the speed that gave them easy leadership in the American section of the league last year.

The New York club will be strengthened to-night by the return of Frank Boucher, brilliant centre ice player, who was unable to take part in the opening game against Maroons owing to an attack of influenza.

Boston Bruins in their initial start displayed the boasted ruggedness predicted by Art Ross before the season's opening. Fitted against the famed speed of the Canadiens who can stand the rough going an interesting tilt is in prospect at Montreal.

Action should be the keynote at Ottawa where the Maroons, young and chance to play, meet the smart team starting its home season eager for a win and the support of the Ottawa populace. Maroons will be hard to subdue.

Chicago Black Hawks were disappointing in the first game at Detroit, but are conceded an edge over Joe Simpson's Americans.

The tournament proved a great success. Dugouts were situated at the eighth and fourteenth holes where refreshments were served to the players during play. In the evening a banquet was held at the clubhouse.

The following artists contributed to the programme: Tom Obee, Frank Fairbridge, Bert Waide, Stanley James, Ernest Franklin, Fred Wright, Billy Berlow and Major Warner.

HAMMOND IN GREAT FORM

Puts on 169 Not Out For M.C.C. Team Against Victoria Cricketers

Melbourne, Australia, Nov. 12.—Brilliant batting gave the touring M.C.C. team a great advantage as play progressed to-day in the exhibition cricket match with Victoria.

At the close of play to-day scores were: Victoria 231 (Oakley 83 not out, Allen 4 for 45 and Voce 4 for 55); M.C.C. 362 for 7 (Wyatt 74, Hammond 169 not out).

Hammond, after a slow start, was in fine form, knocking up his total in a little more than three and a half hours. His innings included one six and twenty fours.

Although the skies were overcast 35,500 spectators were on hand. The pitch was good.

CANADIAN ARMY JUMPERS BEATEN

MOOSE JAW WIN JUNIOR HONORS

Defeat Calgary Altomahs 17 to 8 to Lift Western Canada Championship

Moose Jaw, Nov. 12.—A powerful, well-drilled fighting machine hailing from Saskatchewan, Moose Jaw Maroons, to-day reign as monarchs of western Canada junior rugby.

They swept to their second successive prairie crown and a little closer to their goal—a Dominion championship, which they missed last year by one point—by smothering Calgary Altomahs under a 17-to-8 score on an ice-covered gridiron here before a crowd of 2,500 persons yesterday.

Dave Duchak's toe was the deciding factor in the Moose Jaw triumph. It was his brilliant punting that produced nine of his team's points and was also indirectly responsible for the scoring of three others.

Entering the second frame on the short end of the count, Maroons unbelted a high-powered offensive and in the opening three minutes Duchak hoisted two mighty punts behind the Calgary line, one resulting in a rout and the other rolled to the deadline for a point, which put the teams on an even footing.

With the wind in their backs, Altomahs launched a vigorous attack after the interval, but the best they could do was fatten their score by three points as a result of Roberts' field goal, while Moose Jaw continued their point-making.

U.S. FOOTBALL

Tex Rickard's Great Million-dollar Fights Are Reviewed

Tunney Set High Mark For Purse With $990,445.54

Former Champion Received That Much for Battle With Dempsey at Chicago; Five $1,000,000 Gate Fights All Staged by Rickard; Days of Such Receipts Have Passed Along With the Magician of All Promoters; Leonard and Tandler Drew Bigger Gate Than Old-time Heavyweights

By ROBERT EDGREN

James J. Corbett, famous as the conqueror of the great John L. Sullivan and still champion of the world, was fighting lanky Robert Fitzsimmons, world middleweight champion, in Carson, Nevada, March 17, 1897. The fight was to a finish, for the world heavyweight championship, and Fitzsimmons knocked Corbett out in the fourteenth round of one of the most thrilling battles ever seen in a Queensbury ring. Dan Stewart, the promoter, had built a big pine arena, but the gate receipts were only about $22,000. And did not even cover the expenses. Promoting was a tough game in those days. Imagine that—a mere $22,000—for "the fight of a century."

Six years later Jim Jeffries, then heavyweight champion, who had knocked out both Fitzsimmons and Corbett, gave Corbett a return match in San Francisco. Jim Coffroth, the red-haired promoter of that time, handled his attraction so skillfully that he drew the tremendous gate of $63,340, breaking all records for prize ring gate money up to that time with a sum that was not exceeded until Burns and Johnson met in Australia five years later. There promoter Hugh McIntosh started the world with a gate of $137,000. There was some doubt that any fight would ever draw as much money again.

But a young fellow called "Tex" Rickard, who started by running a fight between Gene and Nelson for fun in Goldfield, Nevada, promoted a Jeffries-Johnson fight at Reno in 1910, and the gate record went away up to $270,765. After paying the record purse of $101,000, with a $10,000 bonus to Jeffries, and expenses of various kinds, Rickard took his "huge profit" and went down to Paraguay to become a cattle king.

FROM CATTLE TO MORE VALUABLE BEEF
If Tex had stayed in South America the gate record might have stayed where he put it at Reno. But Tex spent his money and could not sell his cattle, and came back to New York broke to start again as a promoter. Since that time there have been five prize fights that went over $1,000,000 each. Rickard promoted every $1,000,000 fight ever staged, and Jack Dempsey was his drawing card in each one of them.

Here is the list:
At Chicago, 1927—Dempsey-Tunney, gate $2,688,660.
At Philadelphia, 1928—Dempsey-Tunney, gate $1,895,733.
At Jersey City, 1921—Dempsey-Carpenter, gate $1,788,258.
At New York, 1923—Dempsey-Purpo, gate $1,188,608.
At New York, 1927—Dempsey-Sharkey, gate $1,168,530.

Quite a little jump from the gate drawn by two great champions, Fitzsimmons and Corbett, $22,000, to the gate drawn by two other great champions, Dempsey and Tunney, $2,688,660. Fitzsimmons and Corbett, in a fight to a finish, drew less than one percent of the gate drawn by Dempsey-Tunney in ten rounds to a decision.

But the days of $1,000,000 gates have gone with Tex Rickard, the magician of all promoters, and to-day it seems extremely unlikely that any such gate money ever will be seen again in the sport of glove swinging. A heavyweight championship fight to-day may run a little over $300,000.

FAT PURSES, LEAN POCKETBOOKS
Purses have had their ups and downs, too.
The greatest purse ever paid by any promoter was in the Chicago fight between Dempsey and Tunney—a ten-round decision affair. The total purse was the tremendous sum of $1,415,454. Of this Tunney received $990,445.54 and Dempsey $425,000. It is very unlikely, indeed, that any promoter of the future will ever have the mad genius to gather such gate money and such a percentage.

Jim Corbett and Bob Fitzsimmons in 1897, fighting to a finish for a purse of $15,000, winner take all; Dempsey and Tunney going through a snappy ten rounds to a decision for $2,688,660, a hundred times as much! I wonder what a Tex Rickard could have done as promoter, in more modern times, in such a fight as the colorful finish affair between Corbett and Fitzsimmons. "To a finish"—that means something! Now Rickard would have balked at that phrase!

"UNHEARD-OF PERCENTAGE"
The invincible Jim Jeffries, most powerful heavyweight since the days of James Figg and his caged, divided the unheard-of percentage of $43,608, with Jim Corbett when Coffroth's world record gate was drawn in San Francisco. That was a proud purse in those days, but it was a big ego in Rickard's time it would not have interested a pair of the title-scrapping lightweight. Why, Benny Leonard and Lew Tandler drew a gate of $452,948 in their New York fight in 1923, and split about $250,000 between them with Leonard taking the champion's share.

Football has drawn some immense crowds and big gate money, but nothing to compare with the money drawn in any of Dempsey's biggest fights. Horse racing crowds never get as much important money. English football matches have drawn as many as 250,000 people—but at an average of two shillings a head.

TUNNEY HOLDS RECORD PURSE
Compared with the great money drawn by Rickard's magical promotion the money paid in all fights since Tex used on to more chicken feed. The big money was drawn by a peculiar combination—the most colorful promoter of all time, the most colorful heavyweight champion, and a post-war

BENNY LEONARD AND LEW TANDLER, LIGHTWEIGHTS DREW $452,948. DEMPSEY-SHARKEY WAS THE ONLY MILLION DOLLAR NON-TITLE FIGHT.

LONDON TECS WHIP DETROIT

Canadian Club Scores Brilliant 3 to 1 Victory in International Hockey

Cleveland Indians Pull Surprise By Holding Windsor to 4 to 4 Draw

London, Ont., Nov. 12.—London Tecumseh opened their International Hockey League campaign here yesterday evening with a brilliant 3 to 1 win over Detroit Olympians. Held scoreless in a dull first period, the Tecu got one in the second and ran in two more in the third before Olympians were able to get one past Herbie Stuart. Hicks, veteran London defenseman, scored midway through the second session on a lone effort. Eric Pettenger made it two in the last period, taking Speedy Groh's 13th to score. Gene Carrigan notched the third courier.

Only fifty seconds of play remained when Tony Preslesnik, former winger of Chicago Shamrocks in the American League, came through with the lone Detroit goal.

Pettenger and Carbol, blonde defence player from Chicago, figured in a punching duel in the second period and drew major penalties. After failing to the ice they continued to display their fistie ability. It required four players to part them.

SUMMARY
First period—No score. Penalties, Gillie.

Second period—1, London, Hicks, 8:30. Penalties, majors, Carbol, Pettenger; minors, Taylor, Carbol, Groh.

Third period—2, London, Pettenger (Groh), 8:30; 3, London, Carrigan, 15:30; 4, Detroit, T. Preslesnik, 19:50. Penalties, none.

Windsor, Ont., Nov. 12.—Cleveland Indians, crochets of the International League last winter, and on paper a weaker aggregation as they took the mark for the first game of the 1932-33 campaign here yesterday evening, battled their way to a 4-to-4 overtime tie with Herb Mitchell's Windsor Bulldogs. Three thousand fans saw the Bulldogs outplayed throughout the first period, and most of the third and saved for defeat when Earl Roche tied up the game forty-five seconds before the close of the third period.

"Hap" Holmes went into action with only two new players, Joe Matte, a utility defence man with Pittsburgh last winter, and Deacon Waite, jumping-jack centre obtained from Syracuse for Ken Doraty.

At no time in the contest were the Indians trailing. King Williams put them out in front with the only goal of the first period. Eddie Ouellette tied the count at 1 to 1 early in the second but Cleveland came right back with two goals in a row, Bernie Brophy and Frank Daley were the marksmen, and their accuracy put the invaders in front 3 to 1. Ouellette came back with another goal to leave the clubs on even terms.

Daley got his second goal mid-way through the third in a solo rush, and Earl Roche tied the count again.

SUMMARY
First period—1, Cleveland, Williams (B. Brophy), 4:30. Penalties, Frew (3), D. Roche (2), MacFarlane, Matte.

Second period—2, Windsor, Ouellette (R. Roche), 3:40; 3, Cleveland, B. Brophy, 8:10; 4, Cleveland, Daley, 14:52; 5, Windsor, Ouellette (D. Roche), 15:42; 6, Windsor, Cormier, 15:48. Penalties, Daley, Frew, D. Roche.

Quotations Swerve Sharply Upward On Winnipeg Wheat Pit

Winnipeg, Nov. 12 (Canadian Press).—Wheat prices swerved sharply upward on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange to-day, under an incentive of strength on other grain and stock markets. General demand locally increased with price advances. All futures closed from 1 1/2 to 1 3/4 cents stronger.

November at 48, December at 47 1/2, and May 51 1/2, were each up 1 1/2, while July gained 1 1/2 to 52 1/2.

Chicago houses were credited with active buying here against sales in their own market which also reflected a good outside demand. Export trade, however, was indifferent here.

Liverpool also was from 1d. to 1 1/2d. stronger, though foreign buying was not aggressive and the upturn was not attributed to purchases by importers. Broomhall reported more confidence in wheat from grain circles, due to less pressure of offerings.

Australian wheat exports decreased this week, but the new crop soon will be available for shipment and clearances within the next few weeks probably will be increased to 800,000 bushels, compared with 557,000 last week.

Some 1,610,000 bushels were received at western Canada elevators Thursday, while wheat through the clearing house against November contract amounted to only 16,000 bushels.

There was little change in the cash wheat market, while coarse grains were featured by a fair export business in most grades of oats.

To-day's Grain Markets

WINNIPEG

(By Logan &amp; Bryan)

Winnipeg, Nov. 12.—Wheat—The wheat market was active and strong to-day with prices on the extreme bulge being 1 1/2 to 2 cents above the close on Thursday. There was not a large volume of export business worked over the holiday, business being scattered and in small lots, but possibly the total reached 800,000 bushels. Broomhall's cables were more constructive and friendly to the market, reporting less favorable news from Russia with a somewhat better demand developing for Canadian wheat. Liverpool was quite firm and higher the past two days. Buenos Aires showing strength while the stock market was quite strong yesterday, while the grain markets were closed. The official reduction in the Canadian crop by 36,000,000 bushels was a factor which seems to indicate that the United States spring wheat crop may also be reduced. In the cash market there was a fair demand from exporters, shippers and mills for No. 1 and 2 northern grades and spreads were fractionally better. Other grades were unchanged and durums were slightly easier. Offerings were not pressing. Country marketings on Thursday were 1,610,000 vs. 1,712,000 a year ago. The indications that deliveries from farmers will gradually become less from now on, Chicago was a good buyer here to-day while the seaboard took moderate amounts. Winnipeg closed 1 1/2 to 1 3/4 higher.

Coarse grains—There was some fairly good buying of oats and barley, but it appeared to be largely speculative and in sympathy with the strength in outside markets. Chicago and Minneapolis barley better, but not as strong as prospective beer legislation in the future. Oats closed 1/4 to 1/2 higher, barley 1 1/2 to 1 3/4 higher and rye 1 1/2 to 1 3/4 higher, flax 1 1/2 to 1 3/4 higher. Liverpool due unchanged to 1/4 up on Winnipeg.

Winnipeg, Nov. 12.—Wheat—The wheat market was active and strong to-day with prices on the extreme bulge being 1 1/2 to 2 cents above the close on Thursday. There was not a large volume of export business worked over the holiday, business being scattered and in small lots, but possibly the total reached 800,000 bushels. Broomhall's cables were more constructive and friendly to the market, reporting less favorable news from Russia with a somewhat better demand developing for Canadian wheat. Liverpool was quite firm and higher the past two days. Buenos Aires showing strength while the stock market was quite strong yesterday, while the grain markets were closed. The official reduction in the Canadian crop by 36,000,000 bushels was a factor which seems to indicate that the United States spring wheat crop may also be reduced. In the cash market there was a fair demand from exporters, shippers and mills for No. 1 and 2 northern grades and spreads were fractionally better. Other grades were unchanged and durums were slightly easier. Offerings were not pressing. Country marketings on Thursday were 1,610,000 vs. 1,712,000 a year ago. The indications that deliveries from farmers will gradually become less from now on, Chicago was a good buyer here to-day while the seaboard took moderate amounts. Winnipeg closed 1 1/2 to 1 3/4 higher.

Coarse grains—There was some fairly good buying of oats and barley, but it appeared to be largely speculative and in sympathy with the strength in outside markets. Chicago and Minneapolis barley better, but not as strong as prospective beer legislation in the future. Oats closed 1/4 to 1/2 higher, barley 1 1/2 to 1 3/4 higher and rye 1 1/2 to 1 3/4 higher, flax 1 1/2 to 1 3/4 higher. Liverpool due unchanged to 1/4 up on Winnipeg.

Correlation: The market ignored the government report of Thursday, which was construed as a little bearish and scored a good advance. As in wheat, there was considerable profit taking and selling against the offers on the advance. Cash demand was good locally, but shipping sales were moderate and the country sold about 60,000 bushels to arrive. Export bids were out of line owing to the sharp advance. Look for a more active market and favor purchases on the setbacks.

Oats: A little more active and firm with other grain receipts continue extremely light. Trade was affected mainly by the advance in corn.

Rye: Prices improved with wheat. Barley in good demand and higher.

Dorothy Dix's Letter Box

Wife Whose First Vacation in 25 Years
Caused Hubby to Lose 14 Pounds!
Shall This Wife Have a Baby Despite Her Husband's Precarious Finances?

DEAR MISS DIX—I am taking my first and only vacation in twenty-five years of married life and enjoying it tremendously. But in my month's absence from home hubby has lost fourteen pounds in weight. My daughter, twenty-two years old, is getting weak over her job of household tasks and cooking. My son will not stay in the house much because he cannot see me around. And my pet dog and cat are refusing to eat, and wander from room to room hunting me. So I must cut short my holiday and go back to keep the home together. So much for mother's vacation. What do you say to that?
MRS. F. H.

Answer—Why, I would say that any woman who is that important to her family should feel that she is one of the kingpins that hold the universe together. And I am sure she must be so proud and happy that her very heart must sing for joy.

But your story, my dear Mrs. F. H., proves my contention that every wife and mother should take a vacation away from her family every year, not only for her own sake, but for their sakes. For it gives her husband and children a chance to get a perspective on her and see just how valuable she is to them and how much they need her.

You see, when we are with people all the time we unconsciously get to take them and what they do for granted. The household runs along on greased wheels. Things are always clean and neat and orderly. There is always a light burning in the window when husband and children come home at night. There is always somebody to nurse one if one is sick and to sympathize with one if one is in trouble. But we get so accustomed to this that we do not notice it.

We somehow feel that home just sort of automatically runs itself and that there is some magic that conjures up tasty dinners and fresh clothes and makes beds and sweeps floors, and that mother has not much to do with it, and that while it is nice to have her around, she is by no means a necessity.

But let mother go away and it takes about twenty-four hours for the domestic machine to go to wreck and ruin, and for the floors to get strewn with newspapers and the sink to pile up with unwashed dishes and for the food to give out because nobody thought to order it and for everybody's clothes to get lost and for chaos to set in. And then father and the children begin to perceive what they owe to the woman who makes their lives pleasant and comfortable and to realize that her price is above rubles.

So that is why every wife and mother should insist on a vacation. She not only goes back home rested and refreshed herself, but to be better loved and more appreciated by her family.

And happy is the woman who is necessary to her family. No greater tribute could be paid to her worth than that her husband loses weight in her absence, and that even the cat and dog go from room to room hunting her.
DOROTHY DIX.

DEAR DOROTHY DIX—My husband and I have been married four years. Recently our salary has been cut to less than $200 a month. On this we maintain our home and that of his mother, who is entirely dependent on us for support. Besides this, we help his sisters and occasionally my folks. My problem is I am simply crazy for a baby and my husband thinks I am unreasonable for wanting one under the circumstances, but as far as I can see we have the above responsibilities for good. I am not complaining of that, but I don't think I should be deprived of the enjoyment of a child even in times like these. I see the stork stopping at other poor people's doors.
MRS. X. Y. Z.

Answer—Well, it seems to me that anyone who is a miracle worker enough to support three people, and help a bunch of relatives besides on less than $200 a month must have some sort of a conjure that would enable them even to afford twins. Certainly you must possess some magic that makes a dollar go ten times as far as other people's dollars, or else you would not dream of setting up a baby, which, as you well know, is about as expensive a luxury as one can indulge oneself in.

But hard times will not endure forever. Prosperity will come again and prudence would suggest that you possess your soul in patience until your husband is earning more money and having one more mouth to feed and one more back to clothe will not be such a burden to him. Also, it seems hardly fair to a child to thrust life upon it when you are not even sure of being able to give it anything except the hardest possible conditions of existence.

But, on the other hand, it is undoubtedly true that many children born in poverty, and who had none of the so-called advantages of life, have blessed the world with their genius and brought honor and glory to their parents. So it is up to your conscience whether you make a nest in your house for the stork or shoo it away from your door for the time being.
DOROTHY DIX.

DEAR MISS DIX—My husband and I have been married eighteen years and have three children, the youngest child of four. He has been just as good to me as any living human being could be, but now he has met a glass widow and fallen in love with her and, of course, he has ceased to love me, but I still love him and don't see how I can give him up. He is still kind to me and brings me his pay check and he says I am in no way to blame for his having fallen in love with this other woman. What must I do? Do you think there is a chance to win him back?
HEARTBROKEN WIFE.

Answer—Yes, I do think that there is a chance for a wife to win back that type of husband. If he was a philanderer who has always been having affairs with other women, the case would be hopeless. He would be the one who hasn't any deep affection and can be faithful to no woman.

But when a man is domestic by nature and when he has been kind and good to his wife and they have lived together in peace and harmony for a long number of years, she has really got a hold upon him that cannot be broken. And if he is bound to her by a bond that is woven of habit and association and old memories and struggles shared together and that nothing really can sever. It may loosen for the time, but it is there and in the end it always draws him back.

Such a man may think he is tired of his wife. He may imagine that he has fallen in love with some younger and vamping woman, but it is only a passing fancy, a flare-up of youth and romance that soon dies down, and if his wife will only have the self-control not to nag him about it, and if she will only wait until he finds out for himself that he is a dud and not Don Juan, he will come back to her a chastened and humbled man.

And the wife has on her side the pull of the children. There are not many sirens whose song can drown out the call of a four-year-old for papa.
DOROTHY DIX.

Horoscope

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1932
According to astrology this should be a fairly calm and happy day. The morning hours encourage serious thought.

The planetary influences encourage the making of plans. It is time to forget what is past and to look forward with confidence.

It is predicted that Thanksgiving day will bring many causes for gratitude and assurances of abundance in the future.

Co-operation, long foretold by the seers, is to assume a new importance in the economic world and to assure a novel sort of prosperity. It is prophesied.

Astrologers foresee a movement of the people which will be called radical, although it is really a return to primitive methods of exchange. The clergy should benefit under this sway which will revive interest in religion among persons long indifferent to the churches. This is a day when sermons may fall upon ears that have, astrologers declare, been deaf for a long time.

While this constellation prevails the mind is more open than usual to suggestion and for that reason the preacher should avoid much activity among the churches and foregoes.

The evening is subject to an adverse influence. It is a time to suspend time to stabilize thought and to impart logic. The public should benefit by an optimistic outlook on the coming winter.

There is a favorable aspect for aviation which is to gain greatly through government aid as well as through growing prosperity. This is an auspicious way for the signing of contracts and leases. It should be a lucky day for making investments in land. In the evening a sinister sign seems to rule and it is well to be on guard against deception. It is not a fortunate time for lovers to pledge troth. Storms at sea are forecast and again weather of an extraordinary sort is prophesied for the winter. Furs should be in great demand, especially in middle west cities. The stars presage many reactionary impulses that affect modes and manners. News of a disturbing nature may be expected from foreign countries at the beginning of 1933, the seers prophesy. Diplomats are to meet serious problems, old and new. Persons whose birthdate it is have the augury of a year of more or less anxiety or irritation. It is well to guard the speech and to avoid quarrels. Children born on this day probably will be gifted in the power of speech and will have fine intelligence. Subjects of this sign usually are leaders of their fellow men. Paul Anselm von Feuerbach, German jurist, was born on this day, 1775.

League of Nations Tackles Manchurian Problem Next Week

But What Will It Do When Japan "Goes on Trial" for Alleged Aggression for Which the Shanghai Incident was Only a Smoke Screen? The Charge, the Defence and Possible Outcomes and Background of the Assembly's Discussions Are Here Explained

This news-map shows the progress of Japan's territorial expansion in the Orient, with the dates the various areas were acquired, and also the relative positions of Japanese naval bases in the Pacific. It shows that Japan and her possessions, fence-like, now fringe the eastern coast of Asia from the Arctic to the tropics.

EDITOR'S NOTE: Timely is this story on developments in the Far Eastern situation since the war at Shanghai, a situation which is due to come to a climax on November 14 when Japan "goes on trial" before the League of Nations assembly for alleged violation of treaties in seizing Chinese territory in Manchuria.

JUST a little less than a year ago the long-nosed guns of Japan's navy were hurling shells on Shanghai, Japanese machine gun crews were sweeping through the streets of the terror-stricken Chinese section and Japanese airmen were dropping bombs on the smoking ruins to complete the picture of death and destruction.

What has happened since that time when Japan defied the world to inflict a terrible object lesson on China for boycotting Japanese-made goods?

In the months that have elapsed, this small but militantly aggressive island empire has completely and efficiently overrun China's rich province of Manchuria and set up there, under the protection of Japanese bayonets, the "republic" of Manchukuo.

"LAW AND ORDER"

Continuing its policy of expansion by conquest, Nippon has taken, by force of arms, China's richest region—an area as big as France and Germany combined, which contains more than half of the railroads in China and which is immensely rich in both agricultural and mineral resources.

For this "theft" of a neighboring nation's choicest area—in which violation of three great international treaties is charged—Japan is scheduled to be placed on trial before the world on November 14 when the League of Nations meets at Geneva to take up China's charges. But to make this story clear, it is necessary to go back to September, 1931, when someone—there is a lot of mystery about it—damaged a Japanese-owned railroad just north of the Chinese city of Mukden. The Japanese thereupon invaded Manchuria "to restore law and order."

China's millions, striking back against a powerful military enemy with the best weapon at their command, declared a boycott against Japanese goods. This act cut at the economic heart of industrial Japan, which finds most of its market in China, and the terrible object lesson of Shanghai followed in January. Japan gave as her reason that Japanese lives and property were endangered.

Shanghai, the Chinese said, was a mere smoke screen, for the real purpose of Japan still lay in Manchuria, as later events proved.

MILITARISTS IN CONTROL

Throughout February and March, despite the efforts of the powers to bring peace in Manchuria, the Japanese campaign continued. The Chinese refused to discuss peace terms until the Japanese invaders retired from their soil; this the Japanese refused to do.

In May, the militarists of Japan gained added strength when there developed a fresh outburst of political assassinations and bomb throwing by young army and navy officers. Prime Minister Inukai was killed, the government fell and was replaced by a new government, which was a merely a tool of the army.

Lieut.-Gen. Sada Araki, Japan's minister of war, became the power behind the new government. He is still in control.

In August, Count Uchida, the Japanese minister of foreign affairs, announced plans to recognize a new republic in Manchuria to be known as Manchukuo. Dr. Lo Wen-kan, the Chinese foreign minister, was quick to reply that "Japan has now cast off her mask and openly revealed her scheme of aggression in China."

In September, Japan formally "recognized" this puppet state of her own creation. A government, which guaranteed all existing Japanese rights in Manchuria, was set up under the regency of the former boy emperor of China, Henry Pu-yi.

JAPAN'S 1932 HISTORY

Japan organized this government, wrote its constitution, selected its personnel, staffed its offices with advisers, supplied money and guarded the whole setup with a strong military force. That is the situation to-day.

Thus another chapter has been written in the history of Japan's expansion by force of arms. It follows the clever little empire's seizure of the Kurile Islands in 1875, Formosa in the Chinese-Japanese war of 1895; Kwantung and Sakhalin from the Russians in 1905 and the ultimate annexation of Korea in 1910.

When the League of Nations assembly meets in Geneva next Monday it will have before it a report by a commission of disinterested neutral investigators whom it sent to Manchuria last summer. This long awaited report of the Lytton commission, recently made public, is unfavorable to the Japanese; it refuses point blank to recognize Japanese domination over Manchuria and emphasizes China's right to sovereignty in that region.

The commission was headed by Lord Lytton, an Englishman, and contained an American, a Frenchman, an Italian and a German. The United States government likewise refuses to recognize the fruits of Japan's militarism in Manchuria. But Japan, apparently cares little—she has Manchuria now and, from all indications, intends to keep it.

Never before has a nation been placed on trial before the world, accused of international robbery, as Japan will be at the forthcoming momentous session of the League of Nations. Summed up, the trial amounts to this:

THE CHARGE

Japan is accused of violating three great international treaties which bind the leading nations of the world, each of which Japan signed.

These treaties are:

1. The Nine-Power Pacific Treaty, signed at the Washington arms conference of 1922, which guarantees the integrity of China.
2. The Kellogg-Briand Treaty to outlaw war by pledging nations to abolish war as a national policy.
3. The Covenant of the League of Nations, an instrument for settling disputes between member nations without application to force and which calls for mutual consent in the readjustment of boundaries.

JAPAN'S DEFENCE

1. With regard to the Nine-Power Pacific Treaty, the Japanese reply that conditions in China had become so impossible that Japan, her neighbor, was compelled to take action to protect Japanese interests. (The western powers' position is that when Japan signed this treaty she was well aware of the unfortunate conditions in China and the fact that conditions may have grown worse cannot be used as an excuse for violation.)

2. With regard to the Kellogg-Briand pact, the Japanese reply that they have committed no violations; that their actions in Manchuria were in self-defence, and in accord with reservations made by leading countries. (It is now to be determined whether Japan acted in self-defence.)

3. With regard to the covenant of the League of Nations, the Japanese reply that there was no seizure; that the people of Manchuria rebelled against China and set up an independent government for themselves. (Whether Japan is using this "independent republic" as a pretext for seizing Chinese territory is a question for decision.)

POSSIBLE OUTCOME

1. The League can whitewash Japan and camouflage her Manchurian protectorate by sidetracking the Lytton report.
2. The League can call for a diplomatic, economic and financial boycott.

against Japan until she decides to live up to agreements.

4. Japan can tell the League to go to hang, resign from membership and continue to do as she pleases in China.

TURN TO MILITARISTS

Gripped by an economic depression worse than that in America, the Japanese people have turned blindly to the militarists who promise to lead the nation out of its troubles. For a long time these leaders have fed the people with rumors, threats of an attack from across the Pacific.

Japanese distrust is shown in recent public utterances.

General Nobuyoshi Muto, commanding Japanese officer in Manchuria, declared: "Should anybody attempt to obstruct solution of the Manchurian question, we should be obliged to combat such interference relentlessly, no matter who they may be."

A recent example of the spy scare hysteria came when the Tokio branch of the National City Bank of New York ran into serious trouble with the government while taking photographs of the city for publicity purposes. The War Office made the accusation, that the pictures were actually for use in case of American air raids over Japan. Later, the Foreign Office announced it attached "no blame or suspicion."

CHINA BIDES TIME

A recent movie based on the exploits of navy flyers, created a sensation when it was shown in Japan. Its title, "Hell Divers," was changed to "The Bombing Corps of the Pacific."

and it was "sold" to Japanese audiences as an example of the naval efficiency of a dangerous rival.

And, what of China's future course if the League of Nations fails to evict Japan from Manchuria?

China—vast and weak, but with traditional Celestial patience—has a method all her own.

The Japanese military campaign has been costly to Tokyo. The nation has been forced off the gold standard, the yen has sunk to less than half its par value. For the first time in history, Japanese securities are lower than Chinese, and the government is at its wits' end as to how it can pay foreign loans due this year and next.

Japanese taxes have multiplied several times over (from 50 to 80 per cent of taxes goes for war purposes), but revenues are far down. There is a gaping deficit in the national budget, the trade balance is off 250 million yen, millions of Japanese workmen are unemployed and whole provinces of peasants are living on grass roots.

The Chinese boycott against Japanese-made goods still operates, despite the terrible punishment at Shanghai, and industrial Japan must look to China's 400,000,000 people for the bulk of its trade.

Despite its military success, the conquest of Manchuria has been an economic failure. Many millions of yen have been poured into that venture, and almost nothing has been returned as the region still is in chaos.

Japanese army authorities in Manchuria estimate it will take them from five to seven years to establish order. . . . And China, weak but very patient, is convinced that Japan will be bankrupt long before that time.

How Your Taxes Have Been Increasing Faster Than Anything Else

Trouble in Canada Chiefly Due to Fact That Our Governments Persist in Spending $134 to $152 for Each $100 They Take In; Now We Have to Pay Out in Interest Alone More Than Our Total Revenue Twenty Years Ago

COMBINED taxes levied by Dominion, provincial and municipal governments in Canada were:

1895-6	$ 55,000,000
1904-5	$ 93,091,361
1913-14	$238,036,485
1921-22	$580,851,718
1929-30	$772,969,645

Per capita, the levies are as shown in the diagram:

1895-6	$10.94
1904-5	$15.98
1913-14	$31.20
1921-22	$66.10
1929-30	$77.08

HIGHER TAXES PER FAMILY

Most tax bills are paid by heads of families. Adopting the census returns of 1921 or 4.62 persons as the average per family, then taxes per family of $144.14 in 1913-14 had grown almost 2½ times to $356.10 per family in 1929-30, or almost $90 per month.

These increases have far outrun the indices of basic industrial and financial development, according to a bulletin of the National Committee on Economy in Public Finance. The committee is organized under the auspices of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

ARE TAXES TOO HIGH?

Whether or not taxes are unduly heavy at any time, or are fairly distributed, cannot, however, be left to comparative statistics to decide. Taxes are the point at which the practical side of government comes home to individual citizens; and the people have constitutionally gained and preserved the right to determine, judging for themselves, how great a burden by way of levies may be imposed upon them.

Taxes are compulsory levies by a government for purposes of its revenues. Not all government income is derived from taxes. Sales or leases of de-public domain, fines for infraction of laws, regulatory licenses, etc., yield revenues. Then fees, or payments for special services, such as postage for main services and charges for water, light, power or transportation when supplied by governments, are important contributing sources.

WHAT ARE NOT TAXES

No sharp boundary line can be drawn, either theoretically or practically, between this class of charges and what are called taxes. All imposts are for the purpose of enabling government services to be performed, but where a charge is for a specific service and is fixed in some relation to the estimated cost of that specific service it is not ordinarily called a tax.

For all general services of governments, including the making good of deficits, if any, on specific services, governments raise money wherever they think it can most conveniently or with least social disturbance be obtained. These imposts are classed as taxes.

Between 75 and 80 per cent of all government revenues, as appearing in their accounts, are derived from taxes, and the percentage has not declined despite the great extension of special service charges.

NOT ALL DUE TO WAR

After users of government utilities had paid all that was charged for postage, water, light, power, transportation, money loans, etc., the taxpayers in 1929-30 were required to pay $772,969,645, as against $238,036,485 in 1913-14.

It may be said there is the war debt. But there are also the war taxes. Deduct the war taxes for 1929-30, $134,086,005, and the balance is still $638,883,640, or 270 per cent of the tax bill of 1913-14.

IS UP TO PUBLIC

Per family, exclusive of war taxes,

$150 more was required in 1929-30 than in 1913-14, or $229.29 as against $144.14.

What general services, what deficits in special services, have caused the increase?

Whether existing taxes are wise or tolerable, it is for the public to determine. The decision is a public responsibility. If in the negative, the question will be: What is to be done about it? the bulletin which was prepared by W. Sanford Evans of Winnipeg, and which is one of a series, concludes.

INTEREST CHARGES PILE UP*TAXPAYERS' BURDEN

Canadian governments on the average during the past eighteen years have been spending $134 for every $100 of income, according to W. Sanford Evans, Winnipeg statistician, who has been conducting a series of researches into the cost of government for the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. The difference, says Mr. Evans, has been added to debt.

This average represents also approximately the relative expenditures of the Dominion. Provincial governments have spent $152 for every $100 of income. Municipal governments, with their more restricted credit, have not increased debt in the same proportion, having spent $124 for every $100 of income.

These calculations are based on a comparison of total income with increase in gross direct liabilities.

MUST BE REPAYED

According to Mr. Evans, whose report was issued by Col. W. L. McGregor, chairman of the national committee of business, of government, created a direct charge on income for interest and, moreover, must be repaid. Almost all direct liabilities of governments are for money borrowed for definite terms at stated rates of interest. If provision for repayment out of income is not made, other money must be borrowed to refund. Interest continues a fixed annual charge.

Interest paid in 1930-1931 was $121,289,844 or actually appreciably greater than total consolidated fund expenditures for all purposes in 1912-13, of $112,069,537.

Total revenues of the Dominion from all sources were never large enough prior to 1911-12 to have paid the interest bill of 1930-31.

MUCH LARGER SHARE

In 1930-31 interest payments by the Dominion were over 9½ times as great as in 1912-13. This ratio, of course, reflects an increase in average interest rate, because of heavy borrowings when money was dear, as well as the increase in debt.

In 1930-31 interest payments constituted over 31 per cent of all Consolidated Fund charges, whereas in 1912-13 they were only 11½ per cent of charges one-third as great.

Provinces and municipalities do not aggregate all interest charges on their direct liabilities in one account, as does the Dominion, and therefore figures for these governments, exactly corresponding to the above cannot be given. Their positions are, however, similar, slightly more extreme in some respects in the case of the provinces.

WHAT IS REASONABLE TERM?

If proportionate spending continues, in an easily calculable number of years even present total revenues would not be adequate for interest charges alone.

For repayment of debt, still further real financial obligation exists. Borrowed money must be repaid, and repayment must be within the period of effective service of the investment, or the debt would be liquidated.

On this principle, what is a reasonable term within which existing debts should be liquidated?

They cover objects ranging from funding current deficits, or grading roads, to the defense of national interests in war. Would a fair average of effective service be twenty years, twenty-five years, thirty years?

If thirty years, then the interest charge of the Dominion for 1930-31 of $121,289,844, should be increased by a little over one-third, or by some $43,000,000 of sinking fund, to represent the real annual charge upon income for service of the debt.

The extent to which the various governments are now meeting sinking fund requirements can be determined only after special inquiry, but it should be realized that proper debt charges against income are much heavier than the figures of interest alone.

All these things necessarily follow from spending $134 to $152 for every $100 of income.

Duchess of Marlborough Wielded Power That Was Almost Regal as Staunch Friend of Queen Anne

TWO OF the luckiest women of the eighteenth century were Anne, younger daughter of James, the Duke of York, and Sarah Churchill, first Duchess of Marlborough. These women were brought up together and loved each other with a deeper affection than that which binds together the hearts of sisters. When the two girls lived in the palace of St. James it was highly improbable that Anne would ever become Queen of England. At that time Charles II was on the throne. He was succeeded by Anne's father. It was lucky chance number one for the young princess that James was driven into exile by the Revolution of 1688. Her older sister Mary and her husband, William of Orange, succeeded, and a few years later, when smallpox carried off the Queen, Anne became heiress to the throne. She might have waited a long time, however, before she wielded the sceptre had it not been for William's accidental fall from the horse into the water at the Park. A revolution, an attack of smallpox and a fatal accident—these were the strange dispositions of fate which cleared Anne's path to a golden throne.

SARAH JENNINGS HAD GREAT LUCK

The surprising occurrences which paced her dearest friend on the throne were almost equally fortunate for Sarah Jennings. By the accession of Anne she became second lady in England, the Keeper of the Privy Purse, Groom of the Stole and Mistress of the Robes, easily the most powerful person at court, able to reward her friends and to get even with her enemies. Her three offices brought in a total salary of $2,000 a year. But lucky as she was to be the early playmate and confidential friend of a princess who fell heir to the throne, Sarah Jennings was luckier still in winning the devoted love of Colonel Churchill, a handsome and clever officer who by reason of his personal charm and talent became renowned as William III's trusted commander-in-chief of the Dutch and English forces in the long struggle against the armies of Louis XIV of France. Favorite of the Queen and wife of the celebrated Duke of Marlborough, Anne's Mistress of the Robes was gifted not only with almost sovereign power, wealth and the love and glory conferred upon her by her husband, but by two blessings which the rest, excellent health and a very long life. Born in 1660, the year of the Restoration, she lived in the reigns of six monarchs. Full of the life of the down to the very last, she died in her eighty-fifth year.

ANNE HAD A WARM, LOVING HEART

And the long and fascinating story of this busy life is told in "Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough," by Kathleen Campbell. In this biography we have fuller and more reliable information about Queen Anne and the powerful Duchess than has ever been written. Mrs. Campbell has done an immense amount of research, turning over countless letters and family documents of the period and saturating her work in the family and political history of the Stuarts, and has written these pages with entire freedom from bias or prejudice. While she has not been blind to the faults of Anne and Sarah, she has had the wisdom to see the finer side of both. Macaulay or even Professor Trevelyan, in "Blenheim," the last named historian declares that Anne was not the slow thinker that Macaulay represents her as being, but he does not deliver her from the accusation of dullness. In this volume, however, we get a new interpretation of Anne's character. She becomes very human, a real woman with a warm, loving heart, even if she was capable of Stuart stubbornness. And her intellectual capacity is very considerable. We see this in the letters she wrote to her dear Sarah in her interest in the political movements of her reign. The manner in which she kept in close touch with affairs, her refusal to be dictated to even by her intimate friend, and her final break with the Duchess of Marlborough are ably presented in this detailed study.

FAMOUS FRIENDSHIP SPOILED BY POLITICS

But it is not because of its lively and very clear treatment of the political intrigues in which the Duchess of Marlborough took such a strong hand that we have found such pleasure in reading this new biography. Its greatest charm is that it is a most interesting story of friendship—then that of David and Jonathan or of Damon and Pythias. It was not, alas, a friendship true unto death, for political differences and later lying tongues estranged the Queen and the Duchess, but the story is all the more dramatic on this account. Anne loved her Sarah with a love that was almost a passion and would have gone on loving her to the last had not Sarah Churchill been born with a hoarse temperament and a hunger to manage the affairs of the nation. Even at that Sarah might have loved to the last had she not neglected to look near her royal friend for weeks at a time. Anne had to have somebody to love, so she began to look with favor on a Mrs. Masham, one of Sarah's poor relations for whom she had secured a place at court. So by-and-by the love idyll between Anne and Sarah changed into a drama replete with quarrels and tears, and ending with a tragic scene in which the two erstwhile loving friends parted forever.

MRS. MORLEY WRITES TO MRS. FREEMAN

The early years of this friendship, which is described by Mrs. Campbell as vividly, witnessed the strange spectacle of the two young women writing to each other in their frequent absences under the assumed names, Mrs. Morley and Mrs. Freeman. Although Anne was a stickler for etiquette, she hated the barriers of rank and royalty to exist between her and her darling Sarah. Writing from Winchester, September 20, 1684, she says: "Let me beg of you to call me highness at every word, but be as free with me as one friend ought to be with another. And you can never give me any greater proof of your friendship than in telling me your mind freely in all things, which I do beg of you to do."

Mrs. Campbell points out that "Freeman" was Sarah's choice, "having, as she thought, some consonance with her temperament, and Anne became her 'faithful Morley.' The ladies' husbands were included in the fancy, and Mr. Morley and Mr. Freeman take their appointed place in the correspondence." Mrs. Morley wrote to Mrs. Freeman innumerable letters, most of which now await at Blenheim, editing by some "privileged reader, but the editing of the correspondence is quoted in these pages to show that Anne was able to express herself clearly and with spirit and not without elegance when she took up her grey goose quill to chat with her Sarah.

DUCHESS SUBBED IN PARTING SCENE

Queen Anne was forty-five years of age and the Duchess was fifty when the final break came. By this time Marlborough had become the greatest military genius of his age. Six years before this, on August 21, 1704, bonfires flamed and bells clashed all night as the glorious news of the victory of Blenheim had spread far and wide in England. With magnificent generosity, Queen Anne had provided for the construction of a splendid house on the estate which had been given to the victorious Duke by Parliament. But in spite of all this arm of gratitude to the Duke and Duchess, the Queen's love for Sarah waned and died. It is too long a story to be more than hinted at here, but this author thinks that the final break was due to poisoned tongues carrying to the Queen nasty criticisms of her ascribed to the Duchess. The Duchess forced herself into the presence of the Queen, declared with tears that she had never circulated malicious stories about her, and pleaded that Her Majesty allow her to answer any other charges. "Carried away by her emotion, she was again choked by her passionate sobs, as she implored Anne to tell her what the further charges were. But Anne was turned to stone, and again came the cold insistent parrot phrase that must have driven Sarah, overwrought and hysterical, to frenzy. 'You desired no answer and you shall have none,' until Sarah, at last realizing that her emotion was hurting herself against a wall of adamant, finally exclaimed that Anne would surely suffer for her hardness. 'That will be to myself,' said Anne, and Sarah, exhausted and defeated, left the room and never saw Anne again. This was the parting that they had. For love, as the poet said long ago, will not be constrained by malice, and there is no bitterness so bitter, no insensibility so insensible as that which can be evoked by appeals to emotion that no longer exists, no hatred so intense as that between erstwhile lovers."

A NOVEL WITH REAL CHARACTERS

Another new book which has given me almost as much pleasure as "Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough" is "Royal Flush," by another English woman writer, Margaret Irwin (The Museum Book Company, Toronto), who won the Chaito & Windus Prize of 1930 for her story, "None So Pretty." Miss Irwin has invented a new method for writing historical novels, of which "Royal Flush" is a brilliant specimen. She chooses none but real men, women and children of history. There is not a single character in this story that is a creature of fiction. "This does not say, however, that Miss Irwin gives no rein to her imagination. She calls up fanciful scenes in which she moves her kings, queens, princes, princesses, politicians and courtiers against a French or English background, and as they move they talk, they bow, they pirouette, they work out the drama which one time was their life."

In "Royal Flush" the heroine is Minette, the youngest daughter of Charles I of England. Henrietta Maria fled with her and her other children to Paris and there for several years they nearly starved, even though they lived in a palace. As the family fortunes rose with the accession of Minette's brother Charles to the throne of England, she became the most brilliant woman in the French court. Young Louis loved her, and she, in turn, married him but for reasons of state. So Minette was given in marriage to "Monseigneur," the younger brother of the Grand Monarch. Her husband was a witty degenerate and her life was unhappy, but every reader will agree that it was intensely interesting. One of the unforgettable sections in the story recounts Minette's visit to London, where for the time being she was sent to her brother, Henry Monmouth. He got splendid character sketches of Charles II, Henrietta Maria and Louis XIV in these colorful pages. There is a vast amount of bright conversation in this story, and we receive from it a marvelous picture of court life on its say and its seemy side. We are almost tempted to believe that Miss Irwin has the powers of a conjurer, thus to recall the storied past.—W. T. Allison.

Rockefeller Charity Aim Set Out As Prevention, Not Relief, of Poverty

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER JR., in the current issue of Forbes Magazine, explains the theory on which the Rockefeller philanthropies are conducted.

"It is sometimes complained that we do not give proper consideration to small and perfectly worthy applications for assistance," says Mr. Rockefeller. "We do, indeed, get a great many applications for assistance which we are not able to consider favorably, not because the applications are not for useful purposes, but simply because they lie outside the scope of the work we have set before us to undertake. If one were to devote even a large fortune to making unlimited gifts for small purposes, the fortune would soon be dissipated and great results would not be achieved."

"Our conception has been that we should devote our funds to relatively few, carefully-considered large projects along certain well-defined lines. For instance, the Rockefeller Foundation has centered its interest chiefly upon public health. The effort of the general education board has been to promote education. Our endeavor has been not so much to relieve poverty but to prevent poverty through making it possible for the largest possible number of people to live in healthful surroundings and to obtain educational opportunities fitting them to earn their own livelihood."

"Take the case of the Rockefeller Institute. After the idea of it was conceived and thoroughly pondered, we said to myself, 'Here's a great gamble. You may plant one million or five million and get no crop in the form of medical discovery. The average man cannot afford to put up several million dollars without knowing definitely that there will be tangible results. You can, by doing you may save hundreds of thousands of lives. You may be able to stamp out entirely certain deadly diseases. You may be instrumental in averting untold human suffering not alone by curing diseases, but by preventing them.'"

"We strive, through certain of our agencies, to do things which will benefit humanity at large."

"You will thus see why it is impossible for us to avail ourselves of the very great pleasure it would afford us to do the little things which bring an intimate, personal touch. These smaller things are just as vital as the larger ones, and a warmer measure of personal satisfaction. But that field can be filled by others, whereas we earnestly reach out to do things not done by others, oftentimes things which are vastly important in themselves, but do not attract popular support."

Samuel Butler's "Erewhon" Republished in Everyman

MUCH has been written during the last three years about the part that improved machinery has played in creating present-day unemployment. But as far back as 1872, Samuel Butler, an English novelist, predicted that man would be ruined by his skill in constructing machines which would replace manual labor. This oracular deliverance is to be found in "Erewhon," which has just been republished in the Everyman series. In "Erewhon" (Norfolk), a imaginary country which Butler pretends an Australian named Higgswater covered, the natives had acquired a high state of culture. Higgs found the ruins of railway stations and other evidences of a time in the history of the country when mechanical development had been great. The Erewhonians, however, informed him that their forefathers had torn up their railways, had even destroyed their clocks and watches because they saw that they were becoming mere parasites to their own machines. This seemed one of many wild ideas to those who read this story when it was first published, but it does not seem so startling to-day. How modern this sounds: "How many men at this hour are living in a state of bondage to the mechanical kingdom? What are their whole lives, from the cradle to the grave, in tending them by night and day? Is it not plain that the machines are gaining ground upon us, when we reflect upon the increasing number of those who are bound down to them as slaves, and how many men at this hour are living in a state of bondage to the mechanical kingdom? # French Designers Rise to the Occasion!

Fall Showings Reveal Ingenuity, But Lack Ostentation of Former Years

By ROSETTE HARGROVE

PARIS—The fall showings prove that the genius of French creators has been put to a severe test this season.

Difficult business conditions have made buyers very critical, but the Parisian couture was prepared for this, and the result is that this period will probably be known as one combining the greatest ingenuity in presenting fashions at once new and ingenious, but lacking the ostentation of past prosperous years.

That chic can be achieved without the adjunction of masses of fur trimming is being very cleverly demonstrated in the more practical street clothes. Even in the more formal models, if fur is not spared, it is used to the very best advantage and made to give maximum results with what previously would have been considered minimum volume.

The Directoire, or princess line, seems firmly established. Redfern sponsors it almost exclusively throughout his collection. Nearly all his models are devoid of belts, and fit the figure to the neckline with fullness introduced very gradually to the hemline.

Skirts here, in fact, are a shade narrower and shorter than last season, the scant fullness assuming the form of pleats and inserted godets rather than relying on the bias cut.

WIDER SHOULDER LINES

A great deal of attention, on the other hand, has been bestowed on bodices and sleeves. Redfern sponsors an even broader shoulder line than before, enhanced by sleeves deriving their inspiration from sixteenth century modes. Fur collars on coats extend spirally down the sleeve as far as the elbow.

Dresses for afternoon wear show clever yoke effects at the front or back and slashed sleeves in vivid colors and contrasting materials, such as coral and black, light and dark blue, green and black.

Matching ensembles, that is, dresses of the same shade as the coat, are back again with coral and brown leading for informal wear. Velvet seems to be a close competitor of the new wools for formal afternoon coats and plush velvets are obviously going to occupy quite an important place in this fall's fashion scheme.

Short, jaunty bolero jackets or capes accompany the new wool street dresses, which are devoid of trimming or feature Directoire or bib collars of self material. Lingerie trimmings seem to have suffered a total eclipse. Muffs of the pillow, mushroom and other varieties and on a much larger scale than last winter's accompany many of the jackets and capes.

LACE VIES WITH VELVET

Redfern's evening dresses continue to favor the form-fitted hip line, but they evidence much less fullness than we had grown accustomed to. Lace vies with velvet in popularity and several of the former showed velvet trimmings in the form of torsead belts and bows.

A brown lace model was worn over a pink satin slip and was completed by a tango-colored velvet belt and a tangerine lace had a twin torsead effect at the waist in beige velvet.

Aubergine, amethyst, violet and black and white are the colors featured by this house for both day and evening wear.

Vera Borea's collection offers a great many novel features, especially in her color combinations. Her Potter's Clay, a dull brown beige, and Scarabee, a deep blue green, are sure to be popular, as they are becoming to most coloring. Grey used in conjunction with vivid red, green, blue and brown, scarab and red and a somewhat daring but very successful combination of green and brick are outstanding points.

PLEATS ON THE INCREASE

There are less bias effects in this young designer's collection than last season and more pleats, skirts being generally flat in the back, with pleats or other forms of fullness massed at the front for sport and street clothes.

Suit jackets are hip length and fitted, no longer double breasted but instead featuring important revers and interesting fastenings. No buttons but a number of amusing fastenings, among which are a miniature saddle girth and long, flat safety-pin brooches.

Blouses are of the tuck-in variety with unstitched inverted pleats at the back and sometimes in the front also, or worn over the skirt and showing below the bolero jackets. Those of the vest persuasion have elongated points back and front which strike a very new note.

New colors and handsome handwork join to make winter Paris clothes lovelier than ever. (Left) Redfern makes a smartly tailored two-piece beige wool sports dress and uses beige and red wool for the handworked yoke which gives the dress interesting lines. Short sleeves are good this winter. So is the inverted box pleat in both the back and front of the skirt. (Right) Fabric collars on wool coats are something new. Vera Borea uses rich yellow chambray for this new upstanding collar, giving chic to a stunning rich yellow wool coat.

Borelaster is a new material with an elastic stretch which Borea has reserved for her exclusive use, and which she shows in the guise of intriguing little sweater jackets, buttoning closely to the throat, and of course, in the gayest colorings compatible with the season.

SIMPLER SLEEVES FAVORED

Detached panel effects, cross belt arrangements, simple sleeves, encrusted knobs and ribbon trimmings are afternoon features, and the waistline in these clothes is lower, although few belts are seen. Skirt lengths are perhaps longer here than last season, with evening dresses all floor length and formal afternoon models reaching almost to the ankle.

Sleeves in this house are inclined to be simpler and short sleeves still prevail in spite of the season for sports and some afternoon models. There are several end-of-the-day dresses that are interesting and evidence special study on the part of the creator.

Nearly all have little capes or casques that reveal a semi-decollete neckline to the dress which make them eminently suitable for informal dinner or bridge parties.

Velvet shares favors in Vera Borea's collection with some interesting new wools in the new cotelet or corrugated effects. Among the new fabrics of the velvet variety are the cotelet, cobra, jersey and velourine. Tweeds are striped and there are less diagonal effects. Leather fashions many trimmings in the shape of collars and revers.

Bathing Plants

During the winter your house plants need baths. For plants get moisture through their leaves as well as through their roots. Place them in your tub every few days, turn your shower on gently and let them have the refreshing experience of a real bath.

Simplicity Returns in Hat Styles

Patou Applauds As Frost Nips Eccentric Fantasies of Year Ago

By JEAN PATOU

PARIS—The important change which has just been staged in dress styles naturally resulted in an equally important change in hats. We have seen something which had not taken place for some years—a distinct parallelism in the line of dresses and hats.

The altogether too simple hat styles of past seasons, to which changes without any great purport were brought periodically, were responsible last season for somewhat extravagant fantasies. At that time, too, hats were completely independent of dress lines and this consequently resulted in ensembles which, to say the least, were certainly not in harmony.

ECCETRICITY LOSES OUT

The novel feature in hats this fall is characterized by a complete absence of any eccentric element and a return to simplicity. This simplicity, synonymous of good taste, does not by any means infer that the new hats risk either being banal or lacking in originality. In every category a fantasy of good taste is given a free rein.

Last year's movement in hat styles (I am thinking of the rather exaggerated fantasies we saw then) which at the time caused certain commotion, was at any rate perfectly justified although I never quite approved of many of the extravagant results.

The totally new style trend of this season no longer allows the hat, which may be considered an important accessory, but only an accessory all the same, that liberty of conception which it had assumed during the momentary inaction in fashions generally.

In any case, all my new creations are based on a constant search of equilibrium by the study of lines, volumes and proportions, all of which would risk being totally upset by completing them with a hat which would not have been studied to harmonize with the general ensemble.

As hat styles are far more capricious and evolve with much greater rapidity than dress styles, we have only to look back a few months on hats then being created to ascertain the very rapid change brought in the general lines. This change has gradually conferred upon them a less "cavalier" air in favor of something essentially distinguished and more "ladylike." Yet the new hats have not been shorn of the fantasy indispensable to this important accessory.

LATEST STYLES SMARTER

Another point which the observant will not have failed to note is that very progressively and almost imperceptibly all hats are resuming a sense of equilibrium and while the less recent creations may still possess a certain flare, it is indisputable that the latest styles are far smarter. Personally I prefer them by a long way.

Hat mediums have changed too. Plain and simple felts are replaced by the same felts perhaps but embellished by original stitchings and trimmings. The vogue for velvet hats has brought in its wake a revival of all the fine handwork for which the Parisian modiste is noted the world over.

Something Very Pretty In a New Negligee!

NEWER than pyjamas, and much more feminine and flattering, are the season's negligees. They incorporate into their loveliness the new low shoulders, full sleeves, high necklines and fitted waistline effects of winter's latest gowns for formal occasions. This luscious negligee, worn by Ginger Rogers, is in a soft orchid tone. It is made of velvet, and the soft sheen of the fabric plus its chic cut makes it tremendously smart. Around the molded waistline section there is a corded sash of chenille that ties low to give the impression of Patou's new low waistline. The sandals alternate in orchid and silver straps.

Fresh figs or fresh persimmons make grand desserts when served with heavy cream. They are excellent as a finish to a meal that has not been very hearty.

Leftover coffee is a stimulant for ferns. Pour a little fresh water through the grounds to weaken the coffee slightly and give your ferns a drink of it at least once a week.

At Dame Fashion's Feet

Kid opera pumps change their character, to match up with various costumes, this fall. (Left) To accompany a smart black crepe frock, with new sleeves and a chic white cotton crocheted bib, a black kid opera pump remains classic, with only a small glittering ornament at its throat. (Right) For a suit of brown tweed, with white blouse with brown ribbon trim, a pair of brown kid pumps has tailored stitching, in criss-cross design at the heel and toe.

There is an entirely new feeling in winter hats, as Jean Patou shows in these. (Left) Though there is still a flare to this jaunty cocked hat of a few months ago, it does not fit new fashions. (Centre) This stitched beige felt illustrates the very latest hat angle. (Right) This little model shows that hats no longer perch on one ear. This taupe-beige with its brown trim, has the outline of a distinctly new movement.

What Is More Important Than Holidays He Asks As He Learns New Way To Improve Christmas Cards; Pampered Boston Bull and Spud Pose For Pictures

By WILLIE WINKEL

Hallowe'en has gone and so has the old toothache, thank goodness. And the next big time is Christmas.

When Betty and I were figuring this out last Sunday, Dad said: "You youngsters seem to think that holidays are the most important thing in the world."

Well, I don't want to boast, or be conceited, or anything, but I don't think I am dumb, and I don't know what's more important than holidays.

'Course I know grownups can tell you a lot of things like home lessons, music practice, manners, chores and so on, but they are not things you get excited about. Talking of holidays and Christmas reminds me of something I want to tell you about.

It is pretty nice the way dads and mothers, grandmas and granddads, uncles and aunts and friends remember youngsters and one another at Christmas time and presents and Christmas cards come along from relatives in another city or another country.

Sometimes these uncles and aunts don't know what you look like and you don't know what they look like, and it would be a lot more fun if you did.

That friend of mine named Alec has a good idea on this subject which he showed me the other day. He is going to send photographs with his Christmas cards. He gave me my first lesson in photography and I am hoping I get a camera and other stuff for Christmas.

He's lucky. He has a grand-father and an uncle who used to make photography a hobby and then got tired of it.

So between them he has got a printing box, developing tank, all kinds of chemicals, photograph paper, mounts and everything. It would cost lots of money if he had to buy it all.

When he mixed the chemicals he seemed awfully important. He tested the water with a thermometer. He measured it in a measuring glass and stirred it with a glass stick and did a lot of queer things.

But after that it is easy. You just put a negative on the glass, put a piece of photograph paper on the top, press it down and that lights an electric light in the box.

Then you say: "Hokus Pokus Uncle Wiggily—Bing!"

Then you look at your paper—and there's nothing on it.

Then you put it into a tray of water you call the developer and slowly a picture comes on the paper.

Then you throw it in some more water and then what you call the fixer, and that's all there is to it.

He is going to do lots of pictures and stick them on Christmas cards. He says it gives the "personal touch." He is about twelve now and uses a lot of grown-up expressions like that, but I don't think he knows what a lot of them mean.

When I was there he was doing pictures of his dogs, Spud and Tango. He has them trained so that when he puts a chair on the lawn and calls them, one jumps on the chair and the other sits on the grass to pose while he takes their pictures. Tango, the pet, pampered Boston Bull, with ears like a donkey's, rushes up tickled to death to have his picture taken, but Spud, which Alec calls a real dog, strolls up slowly and yawns, as much as to say, "All right, get this silly stuff over as soon as you can."

A SNAIL SHELL
AFTER SPENDING FIVE YEARS IN A MUSEUM SHOW CASE, WAS FOUND TO CONTAIN A LIVE SNAIL!

THE BEAK of a nighthawk does not appear large when closed, but when the mouth is opened, a yawning cavern some two inches from corner to corner is disclosed. For this reason it can swallow large objects with ease, and not only hummingbirds, but even sparrows have been found inside the stomach of a nighthawk.

SNAILS have been found in the Sahara Desert, in a region where the day temperature reaches 122 degrees Fahrenheit, and where no rain had fallen for five years.

THIS IS KINDA HARD

Little Anna asked her father why he didn't have hair on top of his head.

"For the same reason that grass won't grow on a busy street," he answered. "You know why now, don't you?"

"Sure," she replied. "It can't get up through the concrete."

DOGDOM'S HEROES HAVE THEIR DAY

"ALWAYS TRUE HEARTED"—Thus were inscribed the medals awarded in New York by an organization of animal lovers to the dog heroes here pictured with their owners. "Mickey," the fox terrier shown above with Miss Margaret McPartland, seemed more than a little frightened by the camera. But not long ago he dared to dash through smoke and flame to awaken the occupants of a burning building. "Mickey" is credited with saving six lives.

ONCE A CRIMINAL, "Ming Toy," the chow dog pictured above with her owner, Edwin Barry, of Baltimore, is one of the ranking canine heroes to-day. She was officially condemned to death on suspicion of having bitten a couple of children. But while waiting execution she saved the lives of seventeen dogs when fire broke out in a kennel. So now "Ming Toy" has both a reprieve and a decoration for valor.

DID YOU KNOW—?

Dust falling in Great Britain has been traced to the Sahara Desert, a distance of 2,000 miles.

If all the rain that fell on the earth during the course of a year could be gathered together at one time, it would cover the entire globe to an average depth of 29.13 inches.

A man is taller when he is lying down than when he is standing. Dr. Carroll E. Palmer has found after conducting investigations at Johns Hopkins University.

The largest bronze statue in the world is said to be that of the winged statue of Victory, near Turin, sixty feet in height.

It takes about fifteen months to season the wood used in making ordinary safety matches.

The flea has sucking, not biting, mouth parts, and cannot chew a hole in anything.

The average violin contains about seventy parts.

No fewer than 100,000 people in London live in underground rooms.

A man at the North Pole is about thirteen miles nearer the centre of the earth than one at the equator.

A NEMESIS OF BURGLARS is this fuzzy little dog named "Pooley." When a prowler broke into a Brooklyn house the dog ran upstairs and silently aroused the family by tugging at their bed-covers. The burglar was routed and "Pooley," shown being held by Miss Edna Carbusch, was nominated for one of New York's dog hero medals.

BEDTIME STORY

Uncle Wiggily's Pop Corn

(By HOWARD R. GARIS)

Down at the far end of Uncle Wiggily's garden grew some stalks of corn which, as it was now November, were dry and rattling in the wind. The ears of corn on the dried stalks were not sweet corn, such as Uncle Wiggily and his family had eaten off the cob, with butter and salt in the summer.

Nor was the corn the hard, yellow kind that hens and chickens like to pick up off the ground like heads that have rolled around when the string is broken. It was a different sort of corn and when Little Bub, the rainbow boy, saw Uncle Wiggily hopping toward the far end of his garden on day, Bub asked:

"What kind of corn is that, Unkie Wig?"

"It is pop corn," answered the rabbit gentleman.

"That's fine!" said Little Bub, who could understand rabbit talk as well as speak it. "Please pick me a pop corn ball, Unkie Wig."

"Ha! Ha!" laughed the rabbit gentleman. "Corn doesn't pop itself on the stalks in the field. First I must cut down my corn. Then I must husk it. Then I must shell it to break the kernels off the cob."

"And then what?" asked Little Bub.

The corn popped out

"Then the corn is ready to pop, but it isn't yet a ball that you may eat," said Mr. Longears. "The kernels of the corn must be put in a wire popper and held over a hot fire. The heat bursts the kernels so they pop open, white as snow, and then the corn is almost ready to eat."

"Why isn't it ready as soon as it is popped?" asked Bub who was walking with Uncle Wiggily down to the far end of the bunny's garden.

"Well, of course, you could eat the pop corn then if you wanted to," said Mr. Longears to the rainbow boy, "but pop corn without salt and butter on it hasn't much taste. When I have popped a dish of corn, I melt a little butter, pour it over the hot kernels, sprinkle on a little salt and then—"

"Oh, boy, I guess it tastes good, doesn't it?" exclaimed Bub, asking Uncle Wiggily's pardon for interrupting.

"Yes, it is very good," said the rabbit with a laugh. "And it is also good with molasses or sugar poured over it. That's when you can make pop corn balls."

"Oh, let's do it!" begged Little Bub. So Uncle Wiggily said all right and he and the rainbow boy cut down some stalks of the corn. It was husked and the ears, with the kernels fast to them, were taken up to the hollow stump bungalow. There was no one at home, not even Nurse Jane Fuzzy Wuzzy, so Uncle Wiggily said he and Bub could have the house to themselves to pop corn.

With a clatter, clatter and rattle, the rabbit gentleman shelled the kernels off the cobs, blowing out the dust and bits of chaff. Over the stove hung the wire corn popper with its red handle, just where it had been hung in the spring when the last

The Tynmites had played around so much they flopped down on the ground to take a little rest and Scouty said, "Let's sleep a bit."

The farmer heard him and he said, "Why don't you use my barn, instead? Flop in the hay and when you wake up you'll feel fit."

All of the bunch agreed that this was something that they wouldn't miss. They ran into the barn and soon were deep in slumberland.

When the old farmer heard them snore, into a nearby field he tore. He smiled and to himself said, "Gee, I have a plan that's grand."

"I'll pour oil on my old scarecrow. He'll come to life and then I know that I can put him up to pranks to tease the Tynmites."

When just a few small drops were spread, the funny scarecrow yawned and said, "Oh, thank you! Now I'll look around a while and see the sights."

The farmer answered, "Fine! Now you can help with what I plan to do. The Tynmites are up in my barn and they are sleeping sound."

"While you are hiding in the hay, I'll wake them and take them away. I'll call them to the barn door and they all will gather 'round."

"Then I want you to play some tricks on one of them. Make it real slick." "All right," replied the scarecrow. "This will be a lot of fun."

The Tynmites soon were out in front. The scarecrow then thought up a stunt. Said he, "I'll use this hay rope."

He let the rope down toward the ground and suddenly it dropped around wee Duncy's little shoulders. Up went Duncy, in the air.

"Hey, let me down!" he loudly cried. And then the other Tynmites spied the scarecrow and they laughed to see poor Duncy get a scare.

ARE TWO HEADS BETTER THAN ONE?

It is a turtle, but what a turtle! Two heads, each fully developed and with a mind of its own. When one head decides to go to the right, the other may choose to go to the left—so the turtle gets nowhere at all. This unfortunate dual personality, proving that two heads are not always better than one, was responsible for its easy capture the other day on the shores of a lake near Schenectady, N.Y. Since there is not room for both heads to draw back under the shell at the same time, the strange creature takes turns sleeping with one head and eating with the other.

HELEN SAD WHEN DOG IS HUNTING VICTIM

Courtenay, Nov. 12.—Little Helen Alberry, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Alberry of Rudgwick Farm, Sandwick, is about the most forlorn little girl in the Comox Valley to-day. For a year or two Helen has owned a bright, playful wire-haired terrier named Cleo. Having no brothers or sisters, or any children next door to play with like in a city, Cleo became Helen's best friend. The other day Helen went hunting for ducks with her father. Father's coat caught on the trigger of the gun. It went off and killed Cleo. Cleo gave one puzzled, pitiful glance at Helen and died. Dolls and toys fail to console the little girl for the loss of her pet.

"THE DESERT MOUNTIES"

I know all my readers have heard about the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, who wore red coats and always got their man—that is when they were sent out to catch a criminal they never came back without him. It has changed its name in recent years but there are still lots of "mounties" who go way up north and endure severe hardships to see that the law of Canada is observed.

There is another interesting body of policemen I have been reading about, which has a hard life. It is the Camel Police and has to protect travel in the Arabian desert. These policemen are fine types of men and I know you will all be glad to learn something about them.

This is the season when the raiding Bedouin are out, begins a story in The Children's Newspaper which tells about the Camel policemen.

As the traveler motors through the northern Arabian desert he comes suddenly upon two camel men swinging along on their purebred riding camels. The beasts are well cared for, with trappings of the best. The men, well armed and well clad, wear on their head-ropes a silver star, which shows that they belong to the Iraq Camel police, who work from post to post, two by two, to keep the peace of the desert highway.

They are hardy Bedouins, mostly from Central Arabia, keen of eye and noble of mien.

"I do not mind how tight a corner I am in," one of their officers has said, "if only I have half-a-dozen of these fellows with me."

ECONOMY OF SPEECH

The Camel police lead a hard, vigorous and healthy life, working from well-built posts, twelve or so sharing a dry, wind and water-tight barrack room. When they go out into the blue they live in the familiar Bedouin tent, which has not changed since the days of Abraham. They call it, in Arabic, the house of the father of hair, and it is the all-round camel to whom they owe their tents of skin.

In these tents hospitality is dispensed to the wanderer. As soon as a stranger arrives a beaked brass coffee pot is put on the fire, and in a few moments he is given a little handleless cup into which the host pours a small quantity of coffee. There is great economy of speech in the desert. The guest takes the coffee, drinks it, and hands it back without a word. A little more is poured out, and again drunk in silence; then for the third time the host fills his guest's cup, and it is not etiquette to accept it more than three times. The visitor indicates that he has finished by returning the cup with a circular movement of the wrist. It is not necessary to say thank you. Such things go without saying in the desert.

AN IMPRESSIVE PARADE

The cup returned, the visitor sits with his host on the rug covering the floor of the tent. There follows a little grave talk, or, more probably a long silence. Later, dates and flat Arab bread, like thin pancakes, will be produced, and if the visitor is highly favored a parade may be staged for his special benefit.

The camels are saddled and drawn up in a line, crouching, the leading animal a few paces in front. At a word of command the men swing themselves into the saddle, and, with a terrific roaring, the whole line of beasts rises and moves off in half-sections of two, like well-drilled cavalry, the gaily-colored trapping streaming behind them in the wind.

The camels are all pure bred and are worth from $125 to $150 each—very much more than the scrub camel, which does duty as a pack animal. These riding camels have great powers of endurance, and, what is more important for work of this sort, they have the fine spirit and big heart which only seem to come to a camel with pedigree.

It is said to think that this picturesque corps is gradually being replaced by armored cars, but the raiding tribes have mostly motor-cars, which can do ten miles to the camel's one.

Yet on the desert roads the Camel policeman will always have his uses, and one hopes it will be long before his attractive figure disappears.

Smart New Accessories Add to Vogue of Bridge as Leading Indoor Sport

Inventors Score a Grand Slam With Array of Gadgets for Game and Its Addicts

By JULIA BLANSHARD

ALL THE world, apparently, is catering to the greatest indoor sport, bridge. Exhibited at the first National Contract and Auction Bridge Exposition at the Grand Central Palace in the east has been the largest collection of gadgets, accessories, furnishings and whatnots for bridge fans that has ever been assembled in the name of a single pastime.

Illustrating the universal interest now shown in the game, there are braille cards for the blind, holders for the cards for one-armed players. There are sets of little ivory discs for the deaf to bid with, the trick being to lay down the heart, diamond, spade or club to name the suit you choose and then you raise your fingers to indicate the number of the bid.

AND NOW ALUMINUM CARDS

Card holders appear for use on porches, in penthouses or on sands of boats or any other windy place where a zephyr might blow away your ace just as you are winning.

Side by side with them are aluminum cards that are non-tear and baby card sets for a quiet little game in the Pullman.

Also designed for travelers is the new game, bridge solitaire, a little contrivance that automatically plays against you. If you can't raise a four-some, this has a button which you manipulate for bids and then, when the hands are laid down, they are automatically played.

Brand new and very serviceable is a buffet top which fits down over a bridge table to give you a larger space on which to serve your luncheon or refreshments. It is a boon to the perfect hostess who likes to play when she entertains the club.

FOR SPEEDY SERVING

This thirty-six-inch top, made of washable fabric in lovely pastel tones of green, blue or yellow, with a maple leaf design in self-color to enrich it, can be set up in the kitchen complete with the tomato surprise salad, hors d'oeuvres and beverages and brought in with no time wasted when playing is finished. It sets on to any size card table and is a non-tip device.

This is particularly designed to please hostesses who serve luncheons and those who number men among their guests, for it gives them room enough to be comfortable while eating, in addition to allowing the hostess to prepare in advance.

New bridge tables come complete with their tops all printed with rules for bidding, rules for scoring and rules for playing.

NEW AIDS FOR SCORERS

Equally helpful are the two prize innovations, the scoring finger ring and the pencil scorer. The former is a little finger ring which helps absent-minded or busy people to estimate their honor trio's in contract, with the least amount of trouble. The pencil automatically figures the score by a neat trick of turning the end of it this way or that.

For bridge fans who like to experiment with hands given in newspapers there is a little vest-pocket card table which has its four sides marked North, East, South and West, and has little slots into which the cards fit. It folds up into a minimum of space, and therefore is good for traveling.

There are even contrivances to help you out if you play with neighbors who have a way of peeking! These are holders into which you fit your card hand. They have sides like blinders on which are written rules, regulations, scoring. No one but yourself can see the cards held in the centre portion.

TURN THE CRANK—PRESTO!

New, too, is the little dealer designed by a couple of engineers at Massachusetts Institute of Technology. This is an automatic shuffler and dealer—you merely turn the crank and the dealer does the rest!

The new little accessories for catching ashes and holding glasses are legion. Some book on to the edge of tables and are removable, some are built right on new tables and can be swung under the table when not in use. There is even a new table with little rounding sides by each player to hold smokes and beverages.

There are scores and scores of new playing cards exhibited also. Most popular this year, it seems, are modernistic designs, in sets of cards with different colored backs but the same design. Also interesting are the historic designs of some cards, dating back a century or more.

And very new are the sets of duplicate cards, made with the hands all sorted and labeled North, East, South and West. You buy two boxes of these and ship one to your faraway friends and arrange a schedule by mail by which you simultaneously play the same hands and compete, though miles lie between you.

Nothing has been neglected at this exposition, seemingly. You can even see what the well-dressed bridge player wears for morning, afternoon or evening bridge parties!

For very distinguished players are assembled who illustrate all the fine points of etiquette and fashion quite as much as they show you how to play bridge.

(Courtesy of the National Contract and Auction Bridge Exposition.)

Everybody now can play bridge, even the hostess. For (1) a new portable buffet top is on the market which can be set up in the kitchen and brought in with everything in place to fit snugly over the top of any card table. For reluctant scorekeepers, there is a new automatic scoring pencil (2) and a little finger ring (3). (3) An automatic dealer shuffles and deals when you press a button. For those who like to play out card hands given in the papers, here is a folding vest-pocket cardboard table (4), excellent for travel. (5) Duplicate sets of hands all dealt for play come sealed, eight hands in all, for "long distance" games. (6) Little ivory discs, for deaf players, show the suit being bid without words.

Frank Buck Gets Honey Bear, Prize Clown of the Animal World; Little Cub Saved From Starvation Becomes Funniest Cut-up

The Victoria Daily Times herewith presents the eighth weekly instalment of "Wild Cargo," the thrilling new personal account of the adventures of Frank Buck, the man whom thousands here know through that unforgettable moving picture record of his venturing into the jungles to capture wild animal specimens—"Bring Back Alive."

By FRANK BUCK
With EDWARD ANTHONY

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

THE greatest clown of the animal world is a honey bear that has been raised as a pet. Tame monkeys know plenty about the art of clowning, especially the little rhesus fellows from India, but honey bears are their superiors in the field of plain and fancy comedy. Call the lion the king of beasts and I'll probably pick an argument with you; but name the honey bear as court jester and you'll find me in perfect accord.

The honey bear is the smallest member of the bear family—a coal-black ball of fur which as a new cub resembles in size and shape a chow puppy. Full-grown, he is about one-third the size of our American black bear.

There are several animals that are erroneously known as honey bears, among them the kinkajou of South America, the Himalayan panda, the slow loris of Asia, and the Australian kolo bear. None of these are true bears, the last-named being the only one that is even remotely related to the bear family. The true honey bear is to be found only in the Malay Peninsula, Sumatra, Borneo and adjacent islands. And, as I have said, he is the greatest comedian in the animal world.

THE prize clown of all the honey bears I have handled—and I have brought many of them to this country—was a lovely little rogue who came to be known as Toto. A visitor to my compound insisted that the animal was so like the famous circus clown of that name that no other sobriquet would do. The name stuck.

I picked up Toto on one of my visits to Perak in the Malay Peninsula. He came out of a leaf-lined hole under the roots of a great jungle tree, where he had evidently been left by his mother. I was attracted to his hiding-place by a sound of plaintive whimpering. Walking over to where he lay, I found myself confronted by the most wistful-looking bear cub I'd ever seen. As I lifted him up I could not help noticing how thin he was. And how weak.

HE HAD been so long in need of food that he was hardly worth saving, but there was something so touchingly affectionate in his manner that I decided to take him along and try to bring him back to health.

My guess was that his mother had gone to scout for food, two or three days before, and had never returned. Many a honey bear that sets out in search of the dainties this species lives on—principally wild honey, birds' eggs and jungle fruits—winds up inside a tiger, leopard or python.

It was an even-money bet that this emaciated youngster would not survive the long fast which he had already endured. But if I left him where he was he would soon either starve to death or be devoured by some beast on the prowl.

THE little wail continued contentedly against me as I picked him up. He was glad to be out of the dugout where he had lain so helplessly. I put him into my knapsack and carried him back to my headquarters in Ipoh, where I was assembling a big collection of specimens for shipment to my compound at Katong, a few miles outside Singapore. There I laid him tenderly on a shelf and opened a can of sweetened condensed milk which I thinned with warm water to the consistency of ordinary milk. This I placed in a saucer beside him, but he was too weak to stand and lap it up with his long tongue in the ordinary way. So I put the milk into a nipped bottle, and let him lie on his side while he took his first meal in several days. I have never seen milk disappear more rapidly. It was plain that he was famished. I was afraid he would choke to death in his efforts to make up for lost time, and I took the bottle away from him every few minutes so that his stomach could accustom itself to the novelty of food.

A WEEK later the cub was normal, and when I arrived at Katong he was in as good condition as any of the animals I had brought from Perak. His listlessness had left him and he had added several ounces of weight. If there was any doubt in my mind as to whether he was now well, it was removed by the perpetual inquisitiveness he displayed over every little event and happening in the world around him.

Most of the humor connected with the antics of a honey bear has its roots in an insatiable curiosity. He pokes his nose everywhere, investigates everything. In this respect he is different from other animal clowns. The humor of the monkey, for instance, is due to the fact that he is the greatest of mimics. His fun-making is largely confined to his habit of imitating humans. The honey bear's antics are not imitative, but his own, and there is no limit to the amount of mischief that his quenchless curiosity gets him into. Whatever is going on around him is something for him to investigate. He is as tireless as a senatorial committee.

TOTO was so tame and so completely attached to me that I saw no need to keep him confined all the time. An animal is always better off when allowed to roam the grounds at will. Then he can get all the sunshine and exercise he needs. But of course freedom can be given only to very tame specimens. Toto had five or six companions in freedom, among them a baby orang-utan and a cassowary, a big ostrich-like bird. These "trusties," of course, were put back in their cages at night.

Toto proved a never-failing source of entertainment, amusement and interest from the very day he arrived at Katong, where I lived in a big sprawling bungalow built on concrete pillars rising three feet from the ground.

EVERY MORNING, as soon—as he was out of his cage, he would make a tour of inspection of the house, inside and outside. Having satisfied himself as to everything within, he would go down underneath, first looking over the pillars carefully, tapping them with his paws, as if to see that they still had the proper solidity. Then he would run around each pillar, perhaps suspicious that some foe might be lurking there. Eventually he would become fascinated by the cracks of light coming through the floor above him. The bungalow had the characteristic native floor, laid so that there is a space between boards about three-eighths of an inch wide. This provides ventilation and facilitates sweeping.

ONE morning I noticed him down there at sweeping time. In the road above, Ah Kee, the tukuena (boy of all jobs), was wielding a broom, as attested by the dust that came flying down, filling Toto's eyes and nose and furry coat.

Impatiently he pawed it out of his eyes and sneezed it from his nose. But he stood his ground, looking up with a questioning frown as he studied the situation.

I went on back to the compound and returned a half-hour later. There was Toto in the centre of the living-room, shaking himself and distributing a cloud of the dust which he had collected down below. Angriest Ah Kee picked up the little mischief-maker and administered a spanking, which only resulted in sending new clouds of dust flying in all directions. The more he whopped the dusty offender the more work he made for himself. Finally the outraged tukuena took the little rogue by the scruff of the neck and sent him flying out to the lawn.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

A Honey (Bear) of a Pest Katingulshur!

I HAD an errand down by the road, so I merely grinned appreciation at Ah Kee's anger and went my way across the lawn to my destination. Toto watched me and came running to meet me, seeking sympathy. My honey bear had a galloping gait, moving over the ground in a series of ungainly bounds and leaps. This was typical of his species, but I've never seen a honey bear travel with quite the mirth-provoking awkwardness that characterized Toto's movements. When he got into a real hurry, he would usually place his weight wrongly and go over head-first, heels over teapot, in a furry heap. Frequently he would convulse visitors by running towards me so eagerly when I waved a milk-filled nursing bottle at him that he not only went tumbling head over heels, but turned a series of complete, uncalculated somersaults in the process.

HE USED to climb up on me whenever I sat down anywhere, investigating the contents of the pockets of my khaki coat. Usually they contained a pair or two of pliers and a monkey wrench or some similar treasure. Toto always gave them a thorough study. Unable to dislodge them, he would lick them with his long tongue to see what they tasted like.

If he had nothing else to do, he would follow me down to the animal sheds. He had brains enough to keep a safe distance away from any of the cages where he might encounter any personal danger. He made many friends among the animals, particularly among the birds. The Shama thrush always attracted him, and he soon discovered ways of stealing little morsels of food from the cages occupied by some of the larger birds. His little thefts were done so whimsically and good-naturedly that even the victims did not seem to mind a bit.

ONE afternoon I saw him go galloping across the lawn. An hour later he was discovered in a hammock under a tree, where the caboon (our native gardener) and his wife kept their eighteen-month-old baby. Toto had climbed up into the hammock, made friends with the baby, and finally both of them had gone to sleep, the child's arm around Toto's neck. Bear and baby had plainly hit it off. But the scandalized caboon didn't think much of the friendship, and when he discovered what had happened he sent Toto bouncing out of the hammock on his furry little bottom.

I learned a few days later, however, that the caboon's wife took an entirely different view of the matter. The baby had taken a shine to Toto and spent the next day or two crying for its playmate. The mother thought the baby was right, and behind her husband's back she continued on numerous occasions to bring Toto over to the baby's hammock.

The diplomat-author pressed his point, and before I knew it I had promised to show him the house in Katong.

One Saturday afternoon, after I had received many reminders of my indiscreet promise, I consented to meet Kinkley and take him out to Katong to show him the house. That much I would do. But once there I would find some way to set him against the place.

WITH visitors Toto was the most popular animal on the premises, even though he played many pranks on them. With the servants he grew more and more unpopular. To placate the irate domestics I had Toto tied up for two solid days, but the cub languished so visibly under this punishment that I didn't have the heart to keep it up.

His first act on regaining his freedom was to get into my room, pull back the covers of my bed and get underneath. Ah Kee whopped the suspicious-looking mound with a slipper, the resulting squeals confirming his worst suspicions. Again the tukuena gave Toto the bum's rush. That evening, when the humorless Chinaman voiced his bitter complaint over the occurrence, I began to wonder how much of an asset the honey bear was. After all, it was essential to keep the servants happy.

BUT one day Toto removed all doubts from my mind.

It all came about in this way: I was in the Faffies Hotel in Singapore one evening when I was greeted by an acquaintance, a solemn young man who worked as an assistant in the American consular office. I have so many friends in the consular service that it is impossible for me to think of this branch of the government except in the kindest light; but I never could bring myself to like this particular chap (who ought to have a name, so let us call him Kinkley).

I did not relish the meeting, for Kinkley was the club bore. If he once caught your ear, he would talk interminably and monotonously on his favorite subject—himself. I had no desire to hear again about the memoirs he was writing. In fact it had never seemed right to me that a young man, whose only experience had been a few years pounding consular invoices with a rubber stamp, should annoy the world by writing a volume about it.

I WOULDN'T deny anyone the right to pen his memoirs. It is one of the world's greatest pastimes. But I take violent exception to the fiend who produces a sheaf of his dull reminiscences and starts reading them aloud, uninvited. That was one of Kinkley's failings.

After we had swapped greetings, the diplomat-author remarked, "I hear you've moved to Katong, Buck. You've got the right idea. I'd like to get away from Singapore myself."

That wouldn't do, for it was generally known that I was looking for someone to share my place with me. Although Kinkley would be about the last man in Singapore I would want for a tenant, I must not be rude with him, for after all he had always been very helpful in making out my consular invoices on shipments to America and in assisting me to get passports for my native attendants.

The diplomat-author pressed his point, and before I knew it I had promised to show him the house in Katong.

mat's briefcase with one paw and then the other. If I could get Kinkley away for half an hour, Toto might do something to annoy him out of wanting to live here.

I suggested that we look over the animals and he assented. As we passed out of sight, I noted that Toto had dealt the briefcase a couple of extra wallops with his paw and then, convinced that it was now dead, started lugging it off toward the porch stairs.

FEELING that Toto could be depended upon now to do something which would seriously annoy the bore Mr. Kinkley, I spent a leisurely half-hour showing him all the animals in the compound, elaborately explaining the antecedents and eccentricities of each. All the time I was playing allently that the rogish little Toto would not be deflected from the plaything he had found, but would stick to it until he had done enough damage to that briefcase to make the diplomat-author feel that my home at Katong was no place for him to live. I was sure that Toto was in good form, for only a short time before Ah Kee had caught him rummaging through the linen closet, where he had already pulled from the shelves dozens of sheets, pillowcases and napkins.

TOTO did not disappoint me. In fact he so far outdid my wildest expectations that I could only gasp as Kinkley and I returned, arm in arm, from our half-hour in the compound. As we rounded the corner of the house, the broad front lawn caught my eye. It looked as if a sudden snowstorm had visited it. The entire length and breadth of it, between the wire fences on either side, was white with sheets of paper which the gentle afternoon breezes were blowing hither and yon with gleeful abandon. Flower beds and bushes were decorated with paper. And in the centre of everything was Toto, still scurrying about, chasing little bits of fluttering foolscap, or creating miniature whirlwinds of paper as he somersaulted gaily here and there amidst the devastation he had wrought. The remains of the briefcase lay in the gravel path, its leather flap showing an irregular design where Toto's white teeth had tested its desirability as food.

KINKLEY paused in the middle of a long sentence about the pleasure which was in store for me when he began reading me the recently completed chapters of his memoirs, dealing with the climate and natural history of Aden and Addis-Ababa.

His mouth suddenly flew open as if he were preparing to swallow a football. Blood rushed to his head until his face went through all the gradations of color from his normal pink to a flaming red and a violent purple. His hands flew up over his head like those of a drowning man, clutching spasmodically at the air for support.

"By book! My book!" he finally gasped, still too stunned to move from the place where he stood.

THERE was a long pause while Kinkley choked, seeking for breath. "Somebody's going to answer for this!" he said fiercely, as he began picking up the nearest sheets of his life work.

I routed out Ah Kee and sent him to fetch all the servants, including the caboon and Ali, my Number One animal boy. Soon we were all busy gathering up the pages of Kinkley's masterpiece. I had contrived to amass Toto into the arms of the caboon's wife, with the instructions to let him play with the baby in some out-of-the-way place for a while.

I can still hear Kinkley's agonized falsetto as he directed the rescue of his masterpiece. Incoherent sentences reached my ears in which I caught threats of reprisal . . . hints that the United States Government would hear of the outrage . . . bitter references to my carelessness in permitting vandalistic creatures to roam at large . . . all the indications that Mr. Kinkley was nettled.

IT was a shame, I replied. I always felt badly when a strange briefcase got itself all chewed up on my premises—especially one full of memoirs. But visitors to an animal collector's headquarters should take care not to leave valuables lying around. The owner always did so at his own risk.

Kinkley thought that over for a time, while we all continued to pick up the scribbled foolscap pages from bushes and shrub.

"Well," he said finally, with splendid repression, "this settles any chance you ever had, Buck, of getting me to live with you out here."

I GLANCED up at him. "I'm sorry," I said. "But of course I understand, and I won't insist." To seem properly indignant about what had taken place, I tossed out the unknown animal who had done this deed—Kinkley apparently had not seen Toto—and I pretended to be in a rage as I commanded the uncomprehending caboon in English (of which he understood not a word) to find and punish the fiendish brute.

Kinkley collected every sheet and fragment of paper, thrusting them into the tattered remains of his briefcase. Then he excused himself from staying to dinner, explaining that he must return to his rooms at once and spend the evening and night in arranging his manuscript and ascertaining whether any of it was missing.

TOTO had saved the day. He sat in Kinkley's chair at dinner that night, and had a special meal of sweet biscuits and bonbons. He had not only saved the day, but also the night. For I had hid gloomy forebodings of spending the hours after dinner listening to Kinkley, manuscript in hand, reading his precious memoirs to me until the wee small hours.

Toto's place of honor in the household was preserved until I left on my next trip to America. Then I gave him to an old friend of mine in Manila, an American who had a particular hate for Kinkley.

He had developed a great fondness for the little bear the first time he heard the story of Toto's service to humanity in the matter of Kinkley's memoirs. The gay little mischief-maker is still a member of his household.

Women Run Big City Hospital With No Men; Doctors, Nurses, and Trustees Are Feminine

Accomplishments At New York Infirmary For Women and Children Recall As Contrast Ostracism of First Woman Doctor and Refusal of Women to Speak to Her

By HELEN WELSHIMER

A HOSPITAL of women, by women and for women stands in the congested East Side district of New York. It has been there for seventy-eight years. No men go into the petticoated institution—except as visitors.

The physicians and surgeons, as well as the nurses and patients, are women. Men, as a rule, have the right of way in the medical profession, but at the New York Infirmary for Women and Children women are proving that they can maintain a standard that not only equals but surpasses that of many man-run medical centres.

Forty-five of the best known women physicians in New York are on the staff. They operate as regularly as their brother surgeons do at the other hospitals. The number of their operations has increased almost 100 per cent in the last three years.

MATERNAL deaths at the infirmary at the last count were 3.7 per thousand births, while the city average was 5.4.

There are a few men on the board of trustees, but here again women rule. The roster reads like a section from the social register.

The women who are members of the board work hard. Some of them spend much of their time rolling bandages.

Others make contacts which will be beneficial to the hospital. There are a thousand and one details which require attention, and they give it willingly.

FOR THE Infirmary for Women and Children is not a hospital for the elite.

"Forty per cent of the patients are treated entirely free. Every patient pays less than cost," says Mrs. Norman De R. Whitehouse, socially prominent and an active trustee, who has charge of the promotion for the new building that is going to rise above the East Side some day. "The hospital has done many noteworthy things. It established the first chair of hygiene. It was the first hospital to establish a training school for nurses. The first X-ray taken for the purpose of discovering a foreign substance in a human body was taken by the Infirmary."

"But its most important claim to fame is the fact that it is the first hospital in America devoted exclusively to the care of women and children."

THE WOMEN, however, will not talk about themselves. Neither the trustees, the medical staff, nor the nursing staff. It is part of their code of ethics and they adhere to it as closely as any medical men could ask.

Only the story of the beginning of the hospital is permitted to take on a personality flavor. The forty-five women on the staff know by heart the manner in which Elizabeth Blackwell, who founded the hospital, battled for the right of women to serve as physicians.

Whether she should or shouldn't be allowed to study with them. They decided that she might. But when her course was finished she was ostracized.

Medicine and surgery were a man's job, not a woman's, everyone said. The men physicians said it loudest.

"Women at her boarding house would not speak to her," her niece, Alice Stone Blackwell, says. "Women passing her in the street held their skirts aside."

ELIZABETH BLACKWELL decided that if she couldn't practice any other way she would start her own dispensary. She rented a room on the East Side. Poor women flocked to her. Then she and her sister Emily decided to have a hospital of their own, staffed entirely by women. The hospital grew. Women trusted them. This last year it served 37,650 out-patients, and cared for 2,963 in-patients.

BUT THE most interesting phase of its work is the fact that it affords women physicians a place to achieve a well-balanced medical programme. There are 1,625 staff physicians at twenty-five of New York's important hospitals, and only twenty of them are women. They aren't called staff physicians—just assistants or associates.

But the hospital which is run by women, for women, has a balance in its treasury, and the men of the medical world to-day are admitting that women are professionally competent.

The New York Infirmary for Women and Children, and three of the society women trustees who are devoting their time to the institution's welfare. Lower right is Mrs. Harold E. Talbot; above, Mrs. Norman De R. Whitehouse; and at upper left, Mrs. Frank A. Vanderlip, president of the board.

A Cat Has Nine Lives, But Here Is a Man of Nine Wives

Now He Announces His Decision to Retire From the Wedding Ring, Declaring for Himself a Moratorium On Matrimony

By ELIZABETH WALKER

SIXTY-TWO-YEAR-OLD Paul Ellis, who has learned about women from nine wives and who is said to be Chicago's most married man, is through with women at last.

Any man, he says, should know when he has had enough.

Ellis, now estranged from his ninth wife, made this momentous announcement the other day when he emerged from the Cook county jail where he had spent four months at the instance of Wife No. 8. A little matter of trouble over alimony payments was the cause of it.

HIS decision to retire from the wedding ring, however, should not be taken as a slur on the procession of willing women who have accompanied him to the altar. It is not even a back-hand thrust at the eight and most exasperating of all his wives—Mrs. Rose Klopfer Ellis, who has sent him to jail four times in as many years for defaulting on his alimony payments.

Seen in the Alimony Club "rooms" of the jail where he spent 120 days while charitable organizations helped to take care of his various families, he spoke with a certain pride of his conjugal championship.

"I never was like a lot of fellas," he said with a contemptuous wave of his square, calloused hand toward the barred window. "I never believed in leading a woman on—then dropping her. I married all the women I ever kept company with."

And so—it would seem—he has.

HERE is the log of his matrimonial adventures, compiled with the assistance of his eighth wife:

ONE—Mrs. Bella Ellis, whom he married in Warsaw, Poland, forty-two years ago and divorced a few years later. The charge—hitting him over the head with a candlestick. She now lives in New York.

TWO—Mrs. Mary Ellis, another old country sweetheart who made a trip across the Atlantic to become his bride. She bore him eleven children (four of whom survive), and died in 1911.

THREE—Mrs. Rebecca Dickster Ellis. Of this marriage Paul has no recollection, but his eighth wife has a certified copy of the license issued in 1913 to him and Rebecca.

FOUR—Mrs. Dora Greenberg Ellis, whom he married in 1914. Like her predecessor, Dora did not work at being Mrs. Ellis very long. She walked into Paul's house the afternoon of their wedding, beheld half a dozen children whom he had neglected to mention during their courting days, and walked out again.

FIVE—Mrs. Sadie Siamovitch, "another unworthy wife." After marrying her the perfect lover of the paint buckets discovered that her given name, Sadie, was the same as his mother's and that under the Talmudic law their marriage would not be legal. So, in 1915, he divorced her.

SIX—Mrs. Eva Brown Ellis. She is chiefly remembered by her husband as the "wife who burned to death in 1920." She also bore him a child which later died.

SEVEN—Mrs. Helen Meyers Ellis. Paul married her that his children might have a mother, but she turned out to be a stepmother. So he speedily divorced her.

EIGHT—Mrs. Rose Klopfer Ellis, whom he first encountered sitting on a bench in Douglas Park, Chicago. "I know now," he says sadly, "that I should never have sat down. She has given me nothing but trouble—and little Goldie."

ROSE, however, proved cleverer than her predecessors, and divorced him in February, 1928.

NINE—Mrs. Rae Schuster Ellis, who, despite her predecessor's warning not to marry him, became Paul's wife three months later. Since then she has presented him three children. But in 1929 she complained to the court of domestic relations that he had given her nothing—but beatings.

TO THE four children of the second and favorite Mrs. Paul Ellis, King Solomon's great rival owes his momentary freedom. When a physician examined him recently and found that, in addition to an acute case of matrimony-itis, he was also suffering from heart trouble and other ailments, they passed the hat among themselves and collected enough to satisfy the alimony claims of their sixth stepmother.

Before Circuit Judge Daniel P. Trude would sign a release, however, he exacted from the over-wedded Ellis a promise to declare a matrimonial moratorium—at least until business is better.

Four times in four years Paul Ellis, right, sixty-two-year-old painter, has occupied an alimony cell on complaint of his eighth wife, Mrs. Rose Klopfer Ellis. They have one child, Goldie, eight, who is shown at the left with her mother.

Cancer "Curable" Says Surgery Professor; Seven Medical Wonders Cited

CANCER is now a curable disease, if the disease is discovered in its early stages, a lay audience of 5,000 and an audience of many thousands more out on the air were told by Dr. Burton J. Lee, Clinical Professor of Surgery at Cornell University Medical College and an eminent cancer specialist. He spoke at the annual community health meeting of the American College of Surgeons, holding its twenty-second clinical congress at St. Louis.

Dr. Lee listed a number of symptoms of several types of cancer which should serve as danger signals for immediate treatment by a competent physician. He urged health examinations every six months as a further check on the development of cancer.

A number of other eminent surgeons addressed the audience in non-technical language and acquainted them with the most recent developments in medicine and surgery.

These included Dr. Franklin H. Martin of Chicago, director-general of the college; Drs. Bowman C. Crowell and Malcolm T. MacEachern, associate directors, of Chicago; Dr. Allen B. Kanavel, Professor of Surgery at Northwestern University Medical School and past president of the school; Dr. George W. Grile, eminent Cleveland surgeon and director of the Cleveland Clinic Foundation; Dr. Philip H. Kreutner, Professor of Clinical Orthopedic Surgery at Lovola University School of Medicine; Dr. A. W. Adson, Associate Professor of Surgery at the Mayo Foundation, Rochester, Minn.; Dr. Everts A. Graham, Professor of Surgery at Washington University School of Medicine, St. Louis, and Robert Jolly, superintendent of the Baptist Hospital at Houston, Texas.

DR. J. BENTLEY SQUIER, Professor of Urology at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Columbia University, and president of the American College of Surgeons, presided.

"Cancer is a curable disease," Professor Lee emphasized, adding that "this is a true statement, if the disease is discovered in its early stages."

"The symptoms of early cancer," he continued, "may appear of little importance to the patient, but their significance is readily appreciated by every good doctor."

"Pain is almost never a symptom of early cancer. The public at large must realize the importance of this statement, for over and over again the patient will say, 'I thought this condition of little importance because it was painless.'"

Some forms of cancer, because of their situation or accessibility, can be more readily recognized and effectively treated than types of the disease affecting the internal organs.

CANCER of the skin is a curable disease. It begins as a rough, slightly elevated patch on the surface of the skin, and later the area begins to scale. As the disease progresses, the diseased spot becomes more noticeable, thicker, and a scab may form over it. In both of these cases the disease can be cured if an adequate dose of radium is applied. Every doctor is not competent to handle radium, and treatment of this sort should be in the hands of men specially trained in this field.

"Cancer of the lip is a curable form of cancer. It begins as a small, scaling patch which later is covered by a scab. This patch almost invariably appears upon that portion of the lip where the cigarette, cigar or pipe stem has been habitually held. Cancer of the lip is curable by radium treatment. Additional treatment by X-ray and a surgical operation may be necessary to effect a cure."

CANCER of the tongue in its early stages is a small, slightly tender projection on the tip or surface of the tongue. This form of cancer is an exception to the general rule that cancers are painless, for early cancer of the tongue is painful. The cancer usually appears where a jagged, sharp or irregular tooth has pressed against the side or tip of the tongue.

"In most instances patients developing cancer of the tongue have been careless about the cleanliness and hygiene of their mouths. This disease is rapidly cured by radium treatment. In addition, some form of surgical operation may have to be carried out. In all cases of cancer of the tongue, jagged or irregular teeth must be smoothed off or removed, and a proper mouth hygiene instituted.

"Cancer of the breast when seen early is a curable disease in the vast majority of instances. In almost all cases the first symptom of cancer of the breast is a painless lump which the woman may discover quite accidentally. Tight brassieres or ill-fitting corsets which continually rub against the breast may produce cancer. Whatever the symptom referable to the breast, the patient should see a competent surgeon at once so that a careful examination of the breast may be made. Early cancer of the breast treated by a good surgeon can be cured."

CANCER of the uterus is one of the most curable forms of cancer. At first cancer of the womb is a localized disease. At this stage it is painless, but there is almost invariably a discharge, which is often blood-tinged. If the cancer affects the neck of the organ, radium treatment completely cures the malady if the patient presents herself in an early stage. If the disease is more deeply seated in the body of the uterus, a thorough surgical operation will cure it.

"If each individual in this country, thirty-five years of age or over, would make it a rule to have a careful going over every six months, the cancer problem would be largely solved and many lives would be saved every year."

OWING to the steady rise of the science and practice of medicine," said Dr. Grile, "the average life of man has been prolonged from less than twenty years to more than fifty-eight years. We may ask whether this limit of life must end at fifty-eight years or whether the future man will increase the span of life."

"If the following achievements are realized, the life span will be lengthened still further: First, the further-control and mastery of the remaining infectious diseases, especially of pneumonia; second, an understanding of the factors that produce diseases of the heart and blood vessels and of the factors that are responsible for diabetes; third, the solving of the mystery of cancer and its cure."

THEORETICALLY all of these outstanding tasks of man should be conquered. It is not an unfounded hope that makes us believe that these conquests will be realized some day. Further solution of these problems, he said, depended upon the continuance of scientific work, together with public education.

The "seven wonders of medicine" were enumerated by Dr. Crowell as immunity, anaesthesia and analgesia, antisepsis and asepsis, knowledge of food values, light and ventilation, organotherapy and periodic health examination.

Skeleton Leaves as Nature Presents Them By Robert Connell

NOW AND THEN, between the pages of an old book you may come upon the skeleton of a leaf; colored leaves and petals of flowers are often found, but the leaf skeleton is rarer. Fifty years or so ago thousands of delicate fingers found a pleasant and even instructive pastime in collecting from the garden paths and woodland lanes these fairy networks of fibres. They went still further, for the art of skeletonizing leaves by macerating them and thus hastening the processes of nature became a very popular one. Even yet in old albums and work-boxes collections made in Eastern Canada or across the seas in the British Isles are discovered and the purpose of them puzzles the finder. The beauty of the faint skeletons is obvious, but there was more than an aesthetic impulse behind the collection of them. They come from a time when botany was popular and when an intimate knowledge of plants was considered almost an essential part of the education of a girl in a well-to-do home, as important as music and sketching. Of course very few became in any strict sense of the word botanists, but they got some insight into Nature, and they found a new interest for country walks. A few years ago I had the pleasure of handing over to the University of British Columbia a botanical collection made in Ontario some sixty years ago by a resident of this city, when a young woman, whose care and knowledge were ably aided by arrangement, classification and scientific naming of some hundreds of flowering plants. The collection of skeletonized leaves was less scientific, no doubt, but in many instances it was connected with a real knowledge of the significance of the specimens.

Looking at one of these leaf skeletons, either as we find it in book or collection, or as we pick it up these autumn days from the wreckage of summer, the most obvious thing is that the skin and softer tissues of the leaf have disappeared; nothing but the framework remains. This framework is what we call the skeleton. But in the green leaf we call all these branching fibres and threads "veins," and the skeleton of an animal is certainly not made up of veins. Evidently, in plants, we have something quite different, or else their "veins" are misnamed. There is no doubt the name was given because of the resemblance to the veins of the human body in appearance, and perhaps with the growth of knowledge it turned out that the veins, while they were indeed pipes like our veins, were serving a quite different purpose.

They were, it was discovered, parts of an extensive food and water transportation system whose ramifications extended from root to leaf and from leaf to root. In the minutest veins of the leaf, those tiny twisting threads that mark the last contact with the cells, there are all the features of the trunk, branch, stem and mid-rib, so far as these are concerned in transportation. Minute as they are, each consists of wood or water-conveying material, of best or food-conveying material, and of an outer layer of cells. During the active life of the leaf these veins and vessels are all ceaselessly at work, bringing, during the hours of light, water and dissolved mineral matter to the busy factories of the leaf cells, and at night carrying off the manufactured food to other parts of the plant.

The leaf skeleton is therefore quite unlike an animal skeleton with its assemblage of articulated bones. In the human body the skeleton whose contribution to the erection is chiefly that of stability, in the leaf the "skeleton" is a framework of pipes and tubes. If you can imagine an architect designing a house in which the framework is composed of the various transporting pipes carrying water, steam, gas, electric wires to and from each room, and so on, and then covering this supporting frame with the materials of the walls, you will have an idea of the skeleton of a leaf, in relation to its cells and covering tissues.

Just as in the architecture of houses, we have a great variety of styles although one common plan of roof, walls and floor is found in all, so in the internal structure of leaves as well as in their outward appearance we have, as the skeleton reveals, a variety of structure. It is by means of a knowledge of the venation or veining of leaves that the student of fossil plants is frequently able to identify the genus or even the species to which a leaf fragment belongs. Fossil leaves are found as mere carbonaceous impressions, but fortunately in these the skeleton or vein system is generally fairly clearly defined. Leaves may resemble each other in outline, but the venation is usually characteristic.

One of the best places to find naturally skeletonized leaves is in the grass about the edge of woods where, in the summer, the sweet-scented achlys or verbena-leaf grows. This particular leaf—once much sought after by housewives as a specific against flies—is often found in a charmingly lacy condition after being macerated by the rains and the decay that comes with them. The grass keeps them clean by supporting them above the soil.

"Wonder" Wife of "Ideal" Marriage Weighs Only One Hundred Pounds

Daughter of Rich and Aristocratic Banking Family, Who Sacrificed Social Position to Become Mrs. Norman Thomas, Finds Life Full of Interest and Action; As Four-career Woman, She Leads Existence of Unusual Service—Rearing Five Children, Running Tearoom and Kennel, and As Husband's Secretary

By HELEN WELSHIMER

IT IS always "we," "our," or "us" when Mrs. Norman Thomas, wife of the Socialist party's unsuccessful presidential candidate in this week's United States election, refers to her husband's campaigns.

And it is not ill-advised, for Mrs. Thomas, known as the "perfect," "wonder" or "ideal" wife, was almost as much a part of the campaign as the candidate himself. In the twenty-two years of their married life they have thought alike, acted alike, viewed social problems alike and this year they campaigned together, Mrs. Thomas accompanying her husband on vote-getting tours.

The career they have shared dates, at New York, a restaurant which back to 1910 when Thomas, a young Presbyterian minister just out of Princeton, and Violet Stewart, daughter of a wealthy and aristocratic banking family, were doing social work in New York's tenement districts. He was assistant pastor of Grace Church, in the tenement district; she was nursing in a tuberculosis clinic in the same district.

"I found that helping families to adjust themselves and getting the minds of patients at rest were as important as medical aid," she says, "and in this Mr. Thomas aided me greatly."

HONEYMOON ON BICYCLE

"It has been said we honeymooned on a bicycle. We didn't have a real honeymoon, but we went to and from our work by bicycle—and I always think of the first few years of our work together as a honeymoon extended. It was just like that."

Which "converted" the other to Socialism?

"Well," smiles Mrs. Thomas, "we lived under the same conditions and came to the same conclusion—that something was wrong with the accepted system and order of things."

She knows Socialism thoroughly and likes to discuss the subject in relation to the major problems of the day, but political issues are forgotten when her family is mentioned.

It is quite a family—two boys and three girls. Two are in Vassar and Barnard, two are in high school, and one is working.

Despite her family responsibilities, she has found time to organize women's groups, do social service work, assist her husband in his undertakings, grow flowers, raise pedigreed spaniels as profitable business, and operate blue ribbons, runs a huge tea room that has had to acquire additional space this fall to accommodate its growing clientele, and is private secretary and advisor to her famous husband.

A BUSY PROGRAMME

Mrs. Thomas has been the one-woman retinue in the Socialist presidential campaign entourage.

She travels in the day coach with her husband, stays with him in $2.50 hotels, eats at one-arm restaurants, attends, his average of five speeches a day, sees that his shirts are sent to the laundry, his schedule is kept and in addition takes all his dictation and pounds out the letters at night with two fingers on her portable typewriter.

While en route, her mind is at rest about her home and her two businesses in New York. For she has brought up her children to be useful.

Bill, nineteen years old, runs the kennels with the watchful eye of Polly, aged eighteen, junior at Vassar, looking things over when she comes home for week-ends.

FRANCES WATCHES TEA-ROOM

Frances, freshman at Barnard, sees that the tearoom is kept running along the smooth, efficient lines that her mother started.

This summer both Frances and Polly, along with six Vassar and Smith college girls, waited table in the restaurant.

Little Becky, now in high school, helps Frances. Evan, aged eleven, is in school in Connecticut.

Slender, fragile looking, never weighing much over 100 pounds, Mrs. Thomas, with her ash blonde hair and friendly deep blue eyes, seems exactly like the type of quiet home-woman that would be rightly named Violet, which is her name.

But though always quiet, unassuming and always a sympathetic background for her husband, Mrs. Thomas is a veritable little dynamo.

COURAGE TO SPARE

"I have always cooked meals for large committees and conferences, so I decided running a tea-room would be right in line with my home-work."

The remarkable woman said in a matter-of-fact tone when she launched what to another less efficient woman would have been a terrific responsibility.

to be shown and all take great pride in the huge collection of ribbons their kennels have won.

The whole family is interested in the dogs. When a show comes they all turn in, help groom the pups that are

ROMANCE BORN IN SLUMS

"I expect the tea room and the dogs to put the children through college."

Mrs. Thomas said, cheerfully accepting the fact that being a socialist candidate is not a lucrative profession.

Mrs. Thomas's extraordinary talent for home-making and motherhood only heightens her agreement with her husband's work for a new social order designed to give everybody more of a chance at home and happiness.

For the twenty-two odd years that they have been married, theirs has been an intellectual and personal companionship of the closest kind.

AND OWNS A TEA-ROOM WHICH THE CHILDREN HELP HER OPERATE

They met, originally in 1906, down on the East side, where Norman Thomas was a church worker among the poor and she was a volunteer nurse.

Handing out the charity of the rich gave them a mutual desire to "level people's opportunities upward."

It was the last unemployment crisis of 1915 that convinced both of them that something was wrong with a social system that gave no security to workers. They have both been Socialists ever since, and during the war Mrs. Thomas stood side by side with her husband when he became a conscientious objector.

Her husband makes all the speeches. But Mrs. Thomas "is always in the background, always an efficient helper, always practical, sympathetic, looking after the children and her business, and still the cheerful silent partner."

Hollywood Prepares Banquet Tribute To Its Stars For Year's Best Work

By DAN THOMAS

HOLLYWOOD—Now we again come to that time of year when Hollywood announces to the world what it regards as its best efforts for the past twelve months.

Once each year the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences presents awards for the outstanding achievements in various branches of the film industry. On November 15 those awards, in the shape of gold statues, will be presented at an elaborate banquet to be held by the academy.

The final voting will be done by all members of the academy but the list of eligibles already has been prepared by the committee. Without a doubt, you will disagree with some of the nominations for those high honors. But remember they are Hollywood's own nominations. And they do serve to show what the film industry itself regards as top-notch.

FOLLOWING are the candidates as selected by the committee and my opinion of who will be the winners:

Best performance by an actress: Marie Dressler in "Emma," Lynn Fontanne in "The Guardsman," Helen Hayes

Wallace Beery

Josef von Sternberg

King Vidor

Alfred Lunt

Fredric March

Helen Hayes

Best direction: Frank Borzage for "Bad Girl," King Vidor for "The Champ," Josef von Sternberg for "Shanghai Express." Borzage looks like the winner.

Best art direction: Richard Day in "Arrowsmith," Lazare Meerson in "A Nous la Liberté,"

Some Fish Are Queer; Connell Finds Their Habits and History Interesting

By Robert Connell

Noted Island Naturalist

THE UNITED STATES never made a better bargain than when it bought from the Russian Government in 1867 the territory of Alaska for $7,200,000, or a little more than $12 a square mile.

With the acquisition of this remarkably interesting as well as valuable corner of North America scientists as well as men of affairs began to turn their attention to its resources and natural history. Thus the study of its fishes was early taken up, and in a publication of the United States National Museum in 1879 a description is given of one of the curious fishes of the world. It is popularly known as the Alaska blackfish, but scientifically as Dallia pectoralis. The native tribes of Alaska along the eastern lowlands between the hills and the shores of the Bering Sea have long used this fish as their principal food. It is found in the little shallow streams of the tundra, in the innumerable ponds with their small depths and their abundant moss and sedge, and in the sphenogon of the bogs and muskegs, where there is always water, if no more than will keep the skin of the fish moist. At times the connecting streams are completely blocked by the numbers of fish that gather in them and the ponds present the spectacle of a wriggling mass of life. The natives catch them with traps, chiefly at the end of the brief Arctic summer, and the fish are then carried away in barrels and placed on stands beyond the reach of the village dogs. There they soon freeze and are in permanent cold storage until the spring or the cook thaws them out.

But not only in Alaska is the blackfish found. Across the Bering Sea in Siberia is the peninsula of Chukotka, and on its northern shore is a freshwater lagoon, near Yurevka. Here Basil Nordenfjeld of the Vega wintered in 1878 and first made his acquaintance with the Alaska blackfish. He says: "In the fresh-water lagoon at Yurevka we caught by hundreds a sort of fish altogether new to us, of a type which we should rather have expected to find in the marshes of the equatorial regions than up here in the north. The fish were transported in a dog-sledge to the vessel, where part of them were placed in spirits for the zoologists and the rest fried, not without a protest from our old cook, who thought that the black slimy fish looked remarkably nasty and ugly."

But the Chukches were right; it was a veritable delicacy, in taste somewhat resembling eel, but finer and more fleshy. These fish were, besides, as tough to kill as eels, for after lying an hour and a half in the air they swim, if placed in the water, about as fast as before. For the lagoon has no outlet and appears to freeze completely to the bottom.

Nordenfjeld here refers to the most extraordinary characteristic of the blackfish. This little creature—it is only about eight inches long—can endure the severest cold and be frozen so hard that the baskets collected by the natives require to be chopped out with an axe, and yet in spite of this the little fish on being thawed out is as much alive as it was before being put into this rude but effective cold storage. It is said that when a dog swallows one of these frozen fish the heat of its stomach often restores the fish to life and compels the swallower to vomit the appetizing morsel with a wince. All this is not to be wondered at when we remember that the fish must needs spend its winter naturally in streams and ponds where it is inevitably frozen in the below-zero weather of the Arctic winter. The blackfish, thus hibernates under such conditions, that in spite of the apparently total disappearance of life it is only in a profound sleep or state of suspended animation. The carp or sucker of the Middle West is said to live in water frozen about it, and I have heard the same of pike or jackfish, but although I have seen these great fish of the northern lakes stacked up like cordwood and transported many a mile by sleigh I have never seen or even heard of any sign of returning vitality in a once-frozen specimen. So that the little blackfish would seem to be unique in its ability to go into a long cold storage when the shallow lakes, ponds and streams and the widespread sphagnum bogland are all fast held in the icy grip of the northern winter.

The blackfish is generally supposed to be somewhat closely related to the pike, but some authorities now give it the rank of a separate order, of which it is the sole family, genus and species. In appearance it resembles one of the small mudminnows found in the northeast of this continent, the pygmy umbr, but there are important differences in structure and in particular the skeleton of the blackfish is almost papery in its consistency.

The blackfish is found not only on the mainland of Alaska and on the opposite mainland of Siberia, but also on the large island of St. Lawrence, nearly 100 miles long, which belongs to Alaska but is actually much nearer the Asiatic coast. Now the occurrence of this fresh-water fish on an island 180 miles from one mainland and forty-five from the other, as well as on the opposite side of the Bering Strait, suggest that the blackfish is a relic of days when Bering Strait did not exist and the continents of Asia and North America were united by a land-bridge. Across this land-bridge came a great company of animals from Eurasia to form on this continent a settlement as important in its way as that of the Asiatic tribes who later crossed the Strait to become our Indian population or of the Europeans who ventured over the Atlantic. Less mathematically precise in number and order than the animals who entered the legendary ark of Noah, these immigrants from the northwest were a strange and motley crew. In middle Tertiary times came the curious four-tusked mastodon and the short-tusked rhinoceros, the sabre-toothed tiger and other representatives of the family of cats, and the ancestors of Canada's national totem, the beaver. Antelopes and primitive short-faced bears followed. Finally came the true mammals who are still with us and the Siberian woolly mammoth whose teeth and tusks occasionally turn up in our gravel-pits and like places.

During the last glacial period Alaska was very largely free from the ice-cap that covered other parts of northern North America, and this seems to have been true of the Arctic islands and of the whole region about Bering Strait. It is therefore easy to understand how the blackfish, doubtless widespread formerly across the northern portions of both continents, were able to maintain themselves in a few restricted localities where they were not subjected to the permanent pressure of an ice sheet.

The success of the blackfish in maintaining life and all its functions under conditions so abnormal to the life of a fish furnishes an extraordinary illustration of the adaptation of living beings to their surroundings. Protected from the common enemies of the smaller fish in its concealed streams, ponds and moss of the tundra and thus freed from the necessity of swift motion and restricted to a more or less wriggling motion by the nature of its surroundings, it has lost the firm but flexible skeleton of its kind for one more suitable for its life among the muskegs. In this it approaches the mud-fishes of tropical lands, and it is doubtless this which Nordenfjeld had in mind when he said the fish of the Yurevka lagoon were of a type he would have expected to find in an equatorial marsh rather than in the north.

The mud-fishes are animals of a primitive type which date from very ancient times as far back as the Devonian and Carboniferous. They have the family name of Dipnoi, that is "double-breathers," and there are only three genera in existence to-day. Of these one is confined to South America, where its single species is found in the basin of the Amazon and the Upper Paraguay living in the numerous swamps of these regions. During the rainy season it moves sluggishly about the muddy bottoms, but with the cessation of the rain it begins to burrow in the soft mud. There it forms a cavity provided with a lid and lined with mucus, and in this it lies dormant until the mud of the dry swamp has hardened. Like all the mud-fish, it is provided with a lung by the modification of its swim-bladder and is thus enabled to breathe air in its underground chamber; in the water it also breathes at the surface by this means.

Across the Atlantic in the marshes along such African tropical rivers as the Gambia and the Quillmanne is another mud-fish, which resembles the Alaska blackfish in its powers of resistance. "It has extraordinary vitality, surviving severe wounds, long fasting and desiccation." It forms an underground chamber as its South American relative does, and there remains dormant until the swamps once more fill. When in this condition it can be gathered, stored and shipped to Europe, just as the blackfish is collected and stacked in Alaska or Siberia.

The South American mud-fish is about a yard long, the African about two, and in Australia another one occurs about the same size as the latter. Locally known by the native name of "barramunda," it is valued as food. Its home is in the water-holes along the courses of the Queensland rivers and in the marshes. Here it partakes of a diet apparently largely vegetarian, but perhaps rich in the varied animal life of the herbage and foliage of the banks and neighboring trees. It is said that it comes out of the water at night, and feeds on the mud-flats, when its "lung" enables it to breathe. It is a curious-looking animal to judge by its pictures, with a small head and thick body clothed with large rounded scales and with its vertical fin and tail forming an apparently continuous stream of rays about the posterior end. The shape suggests a torpedo flattened at the sides. It is more fish-like than its other relations, who are rather slug-like of cells. It does not burrow, but it can exist under conditions that would mean death to other fish, such as a high degree of impurity in the water from rotting vegetable matter or excessive mud, but unlike the other mud-fishes, it seems incapable of living entirely out of the water.

The existence of these curious fish in places so far apart is one of the very numerous zoological arguments for the existence at some time in the past of geographical connecting links between the continents of North America, Africa and Australia. But what the nature of the links may have been is a disputed point. Some think—it is as yet the more general view—that these three land-masses are only portions of a vaster land-mass the intermediate portions of which have sunk beneath the sea; others again, following Wegener, believe that the three with India were originally one and have broken and drifted asunder to their present places. The ancient continent has been named Gondwanaland after one of the provinces of Central India. Similarly the old land-bridge between Alaska and Siberia has been called Beringia, after Bering Strait. As I have pointed out before, one of the principal zoological arguments for the former union of the land at this point, whether by a now sunken area or by their drifting apart, is the existence of the little family of the Dallidae with its single species, Dallia pectoralis, the Alaska blackfish, also of an ancient type. Thus these eccentric fish of the Arctic north and of the Tropics with their respective responses to extreme cold and to extreme drought, to shallow waters and saturated moss and to pools often fouled with mud and poor in oxygen, occupy a place in our conceptions of the world's history and life quite out of proportion to their numbers or their economic importance.

What is reported of the barramunda—that it goes ashore on the mud-flats at night, seeking food, recalls the fact that the members of the very numerous and widespread carp family, which includes the barbel, minnow, dace, gudgeon, roach, bream, tench and loach, are all inclined to be particularly active at night while during the day they are more or less sluggish. At the same time carp have been seen to excavate refuges in the mud at the bottom of the deep holes they resort to in winter, and in these they spend a period of hibernation. Gilbert White has a note about the annual disappearance of the carp: "In the garden of the Black Bear Inn in the town of Reading is a stream or canal running under the stables and out into the fields on the other side of the road; in this water are many carps, which lie rolling about in sight, being fed by travelers who amuse themselves by tossing them bread; but as soon as the weather grows at all severe these fishes are no longer seen, because they retire under the stables where they remain till the return of spring. Do they lie in a torpid state? If they do not, how are they supported?"

There are two species of fish found in the Great Lakes that have a rather remarkable history. These are known popularly as the garpike and the bowfin. They belong to the group of bony ganoids which in the early days of the earth's history occupied a very important place and furnished many strange members, some of which will always be connected with the memory of Hugh Miller of "The Old Red Sandstone." They are chiefly distinguished by having an outer covering of scales, plates or spines, which possess two distinct layers, a lower one of bone, an upper one of enamel resembling that of teeth. There are, of course, other peculiarities distinguishing them from the vast majority of our modern fish, but this is perhaps the most striking one.

The garpike is covered with bony scales that have the figure of a rhomboid, that is, are equilateral but not right-angled. It has a long, bony snout and its slender jaws are armed with rows of sharp teeth. The day is spent in the deep waters of the lakes, but at night the fish comes to the surface. As it is usually seen to alternate this in the summer and autumn while in the spring it goes to shallow water for the spawning season, it is believed that it spends the winter in a more or less dormant condition in the deeps. The bowfin also spends its winters in the deep waters of the lakes and migrates to the herbage of the shallows at the spawning time, when it builds a nest for the reception of the eggs, which are guarded by the male until the period of incubation is completed. Both the garpike and the bowfin have lung-like swimming bladders and are able in consequence to live for some time out of water.

The garpikes are divided into three species, which are found only in the fresh waters of North and Central America and of Cuba. The bowfin is confined to the Great Lakes. Both fish were once far more widely dispersed, their fossil remains occurring in both Europe and America in rocks of Eocene and Lower Miocene age. In America they escaped the ravages of the glacial period by retreating to lake refuges formed south of the ice-cap.

Here again as with the blackfish and the mud-fish the old connections have been lost by great changes in the topography of the earth, so that the garpikes are now only found at the angles of a triangle whose sides are as much as 900, 1,300 and 1,600 miles in length.

QUEEN STARTS TO DO HER CHRISTMAS SHOPPING EARLY

BUYING 1,500 PRESENTS
TO FILL HER GIFT LIST;
PRINCE'S STYLES AWAITED

Latest photograph of Queen Mary as she took a day off with the King at a country racing event to rest up for the start of her long and heavy duty of personally buying Christmas presents for each of the 1,500 persons whose names are on her gift list.

Reuter's Special to The Victoria Times

LONDON—The Queen has already started buying her Christmas presents.

Each afternoon recently she has been making tours of antique shops in various parts of the West End on the look-out for gifts. It is no wonder that she starts so early, because she gives 1,500 presents every year.

There is a special room in Buckingham Palace where the gifts are stored until the time comes to send them away.

Did you know that the Queen always gives the same wedding gifts to brides? She presents them with a diamond brooch, which is duly worn in a place of honor on the wedding-dress.

But for Christmas Her Majesty feels that antiques are always welcome presents. And so do the antique dealers! GIFTS FOR MUSEUMS

The Queen has always been helpful to the antique dealers. She not only buys personal gifts from them, but often buys other treasures, and gives them to various museums. The Victorian period collection at the Victoria and Albert Museum was recently completed as a result of her efforts, while in the Indian Museum there is a wonderful sari decorated with seed pearls, which was also the gift of the Queen. Then she gave to the United Service Museum a very rare box issued to surviving field officers of the Peninsular War. Inside it are miniature colored engravings of Peninsular scenes.

THE CHEAPEST CHRISTMAS

Britain's prospects for Christmas are certainly brighter than they were at this time last year. Both banks and shops report that people are now feeling able to spend their money more freely, while the producers are doing their best to make this the cheapest Christmas there has been for a long time.

Wholesale traders say this is going to be a "five-shilling" Christmas. They mean that there are to be more presents which the shops will be able to sell profitably at five shillings or thereabouts.

THE PRINCE'S CLOTHES

The shopkeepers are wondering what new fashions in country clothes the Prince of Wales will start this autumn when he resumes hunting at Melton-Mowbray.

Although he dresses just to please himself, no Beau Brummel ever led the country's fashions more surely. He has to appear in a golf-jacket or a Fair Isle sweater, for there to be an instantaneous rush on golf-jackets and Fair Isle sweaters.

High tribute to the Prince's influence on what the world wears has, indeed, just been paid by the important trade journal, The Tailor and Cutter.

"No country is too democratic to pay him tribute," says that organ of Saville Row. "Republics vie with monarchies in sartorial imitation. He has removed frontiers by peaceful penetration, and the world is now dressed in English style."

"The Prince of Wales dislikes the stereotyped and immutable and is constantly flashing out a note here and there to brighten and relieve. He realizes that the purpose of attire is not merely to protect and cover, but to afford display."

Conquer Reflections On Glazed Paintings

Reuter's Special to The Victoria Times
London.—An invention which, it is claimed, eliminates reflections from glazed pictures in art galleries, has just been demonstrated at the Royal Society of Arts by Robert Howden, an architect.

The device is that a concave sheet of glass can be so arranged in front of the painting that from whatever point the picture is observed all reflection is eliminated.

The ceiling of the gallery, painted a dark color, absorbs all the light which would normally have caused the reflection. The glass, fixed at any required distance from the picture and extending, if necessary, the length of the gallery, is invisible.

Art gallery experts, including Lord Lee of Fareham, appeared very interested in the demonstration, though there are apparently objections to the device on the commercial side. One observer estimated that to equip the National Gallery in this way at present would cost about £150,000.

THEATRE IDOLS HIT BIG SLUMP

Popular Actors, as of Old, Fall on Evil Days and Slip Into Pauperism

Reuter's Special to The Victoria Times
London.—The idol of thousands, the man who has only to walk on to the stage to rouse a storm of applause from the audience—and then the public's whim changes, neglect follows admiration, poverty follows luxury. It is an old story, this tale of the popular actor who sinks into pauperism, but it constantly recurs. The case of a variety artist who once received £40 a week, but has now fallen on evil days, has just been revealed. He is only one of many. There are dozens of men and women who but a few years ago were the rage of the London stage, but are now on the border line of poverty.

It is true, however, that there is another side to the picture. There are actors and actresses who are idols of the stage to-day, who once fought what seemed a hopeless struggle against hardship and poverty. They are certainly one of variety artists' official of the Variety Artists' Benevolent Fund.

"We come into close touch with those who have attained success and those who have fallen to the depths of destitution."

"Here is a tragedy. A well known music hall artiste and his wife had fallen on hard times. Their 'props' had been stored in the luggage office at Victoria Station for several weeks. They obtained an engagement but had not the money to pay their fare or even to get their 'stuff' out of the cloak room."

"We advanced them the money, and the man, in order to save every penny, borrowed a handkerchief on which to take his 'props' from Victoria to Waterloo. He was taking his goods across to Waterloo, where he was to meet his wife. Crossing Westminster Bridge, he was knocked down and killed."

"He persuaded his wife to carry on with the rehearsals, and she did so. She made good, and is to-day married to a well-known artiste."

"Thank goodness," the official added, "the artists of the present day are becoming more careful and have more balance than in the old days. They do not get the colossal salaries they did in years gone by, but they try to put a little away for a rainy day."

Methodist Preacher Still Young at 95

Reuter's Special to The Victoria Times
London.—The Rev. Thomas Scowby, the ninety-five-year-old minister whom all the preachers and elders of the United Methodist Church honored in a stirring scene at the close of their uniting conference in London, says he never thinks of growing old.

"I hope always to keep young," he declares. And his eyes are still bright, and his face is glowing with health.

"It is really not difficult," he explains, "there are plenty of men in Methodism alone—men like Dr. Scott Lidgett, our president at seventy-eight, and Sir Robert Perks, our vice-president at eighty-three—who may be reckoned old in years, but who are always young in spirit and outlook and activity."

"They are indeed the leaders of the movement which, through reunion, is bringing Methodism to a renewed youth and vitality and will probably lead to a great spiritual revival. They, I

Irish Passions High As Prince's First Visit Nears To Open For King New Parliament House At Belfast

TWO ARMIES OF THE TWO IRELANDS—In the streets of Belfast, squads of the stout Royal Ulster Constabulary are marching (above) ... while in Dublin parade the regular troops of the Irish Free State (below) ... Both are in a state of tension as the Prince of Wales prepares to visit Belfast.

LONDON.—A peer of Ireland, the Earl of Carrick, is going to Belfast on November 16. No news, you say.

But it is news when that peer happens to be Edward Albert Christian George Andrew Patrick David, Prince of Wales. Though he is one of the most-traveled men of his time, it is the Prince's first visit to Ireland.

The Prince is going to represent King George at the dedication of the new Parliament House of Northern Ireland at Belfast, where recently there was fatal dole rioting. The visit is almost certain to insure ill feeling on the part of some Irish. Belfast is planning the largest bodyguard for the Prince that he has ever had. Police leaves have been canceled and every safety measure taken.

The visit is expected to emphasize the cleavage between the two Ireland—Ulster on the northeast corner, loyal to the British Empire; the Free State, comprising all the rest of Erin, insistent on abolition of the oath to the empire, land annuities, and a united Ireland. Bad feeling and even border disorders between the two states have been frequent in the past, and the Prince of Wales's visit, already protested by the Sinn Féin committee in Dublin as "the latest English act of defiance of the rights and liberties of the Irish people," may bring real trouble.

Thus differences in life, thought and religion led through the centuries to a deep cleavage between Ulster and the rest of Ireland. There has even been bitter fighting, most famous of which was the Battle of the Boyne, in 1690. William III of England, allied with Ulster troops, fought the exiled James II with French and southern Irish troops. William won, and since then Ulster Protestants have flaunted the colors of William, and as Orangemen scribbled with the wipers of the green on July 12.

Religious difference rubbed these wounds. Even of southern Catholics led to a bitterness which was not fancy, have discovered in their work the secret of perennial youth.

"How do I keep so young? Well, chiefly through mental activity, through always keeping bright and alert to all the phases of thought in philosophy and theology, both through reading and personal intercourse, and in cherishing the best company—by best company, I mean religious and intellectual."

"I have no special course of diet to keep me fit; no rules or fads about food, but I have always been a non-smoker, an abstainer, a vigorous walker and cyclist, and a firm believer in the healthy habit of rising early. Above all, I have always kept a hopeful outlook on life."

Stage Route March To Recall War Days

London.—A battalion of ex-soldiers have just gone on a route march—for fun.

They are former members of the Leeds Pals Battalion, and they marched over the same ten-mile route in north Yorkshire when eighteen years ago they went into camp. But this time they did not carry 140 pounds of equipment; they travelled light. Moreover, no strident voice of a sergeant-major harassed them.

They halted at their old camping grounds and tramped over the hills to the wayside hostilities where they used to shake their thirst after a day's training. For these men have found that there were some happy memories of the war, after all.

Policemen Idle In Sinless Town

London.—There are towns and even counties in England where they have hardly ever seen a bandit of a burglar, or a bag-snatcher, or any other criminal—except on the pictures.

Unbelievable though this sounds, it is perfectly true. There is Oswestry, for instance, which has been called the "Policeman's Paradise."

Officers in sinful cities or troublesome towns think with an envious sigh of the constables in Oswestry, an ancient Shropshire borough. For in Oswestry, for the eleventh time in succession, there were no prisoners for trial at the Quarter Sessions. All court formalities were dispensed with, and jurors were told they need not attend.

So in Oswestry the policeman's lot must be a most happy one. No "enterprising burglars" at work, no "cut-throats occupied with crime." A small boy smoking a surreptitious cigarette would seem a horrid blot on the morals of a town like this!

Members of the force in other places ought to be sent to Oswestry for a rest cure," remarked a London policeman, as he directed four streams of traffic at a junction. "No crime for eleven sessions—why, it isn't healthy!"

A study of the latest official criminal statistics shows that Oswestry is not by any means the only stronghold of virtue. During the most recent twelve months for which figures are available, there has not been a single case at Ludlow Borough Sessions or at Wenlock Borough Sessions. At Shrewsbury, which has a population of 32,370, only one case appeared for trial at the Borough Sessions. And in the whole of Shropshire with its 244,162 law-abiding citizens, only 28 cases were tried. Some one has named the county "Sinless Salop!"

Rutland, the smallest county, is Righteous Rutland, too. It has a population of 17,397, and at the county assizes and the county sessions not a single case was down for trial.

There are at least fifteen other places, too, where there has been a crimeless calendar at the sessions, and many other big areas present amazingly small crime lists.

It appears to be the densely-populated places where crime occurs. In London during the period for which these figures are taken, 1,828 persons appeared in the dock. Of these, 131 were sent to penal servitude, 624 were otherwise imprisoned, 58 went to Borstal and others were dealt with in various ways. Lancashire and Yorkshire also have heavy calendars.

to speak there several years ago. The Ulster Government forbade De Valera to set foot on Ulster soil, citing that his presence would be a threat to civil order.

De Valera nevertheless went to Newry to speak. Before he began he was arrested (this was before he had become the Free State's president). He was taken to Adavoy, where the train from Belfast was halted, and he was put aboard for Dublin. Two days later he motored from Sligo to Derry, and again was arrested and sent over to prison his chief opponent for the presidency. Ulster was willing if De Valera would promise to stay out of Ulster forever. He wouldn't. He served his full month in jail.

In reply to a question the other day in the Ulster House of Commons, it was revealed that the ban on De Valera no longer exists now that he is president of the Free State, but the incident throws much light on the relations between the two Irelands.

LOYAL COMMUNITY TO WELCOME

It will be a loyal but greatly disturbed community that welcomes the Prince of Wales to Belfast to dedicate the Parliament House of Northern Ireland.

Belfast, with its crippled textile and shipbuilding industries, has felt the heavy hand of unemployment. It only recently has been necessary to call in the military to suppress disturbances. Catholics were stoned in Belfast during the recent Eucharistic Congress in Dublin. For although two-thirds of the people of Northern Ireland are Protestant, the minority Irish are concentrated in the great cities such as Belfast, Armagh and Londonderry.

An ugly rumour rose recently that the British Government was going to betray the loyalty of Northern Ireland by using it as a pawn in the difficult negotiations with the Free State over the land annuities. This has been indignantly denied, and Lord Craigavon, Premier of Northern Ireland, made a secret and hurried trip to London to get definite assurances from Dominions Secretary J. H. Thomas and Home Secretary Sir

Herbert Samuel that it was not so. He was assured that any such deal was "fantastic and unthinkable."

But these negotiations between the Free State and the British Empire have been so difficult and so full of dynamite that almost any rumor was believed.

UNITED IRELAND IS HOPE

The Free State, under the administrations of both former President William T. Cosgrave and the present Eamonn De Valera, has tried desperately to settle three vexatious questions:

First, removal of the oath of allegiance to the King and the empire.

Second, retention in Ireland of land annuities formerly paid to Britain.

Third, a united republican Ireland. The oath, which De Valera proposed to abolish, has been submerged in the rising tide of controversy over the land annuities, and the question of a united Ireland seems impossible at present.

The land annuity controversy began at the beginning of this century. In hope of solving the land problem, the British Government bought most of the Irish lands from the landlords, and sold them back to the tenants on long-term payments. Thus it was hoped to make the land debts payable to the government rather than to individual landlords, and by extending government credit to solve the problem once and for all. These payments were made to the Irish Government and by it to the British.

Suddenly De Valera's Free State refused to pay over the annuities to the British, claiming they belonged to the Free State Government. They are held in a special fund in Dublin.

In a dramatic move, De Valera only recently has forced out of office the royal Governor-General, James McNeill, and closed Viceroy Lodge in Dublin. With this and the disappearance of British troops from the Free State, the last physical ties with the empire have vanished. Radical Republicans are insisting that nothing less than a completely independent Irish republic will satisfy them.

The British, who have tradition and certain practical considerations in mind, opposed the complete separation of Ireland by a series of retaliatory duties on Irish produce coming into Britain, up to 100 per cent. The British, while willing to see Dominion status in Ireland, fear an independent Irish republic because of the possibility of seeing its harbors seized and its territory used as a base for foreign invaders in case of war.

BRITISH IMPOSE DUTIES

Clashing opinion within the Free State itself makes the situation even more complicated. De Valera is faced with rival organizations. Recently an Irish Republican "army" seized Donaghmore Castle as a centre for its troops, but later evacuated it. And Colonel Thomas O'Higgins's Army Comrades Association is growing. This is a "White" army, aimed at preserving law and order, and preventing a return to that sort of guerrilla warfare which has torn Ireland for hundreds of years. The Republican, or "Red" army, persists, though President Cosgrave tried to disband it, and it is thought that one of the objects of O'Higgins's "White" army is to force President De Valera to disband them both. In a state with a population of 3,000,000 there are already two official armies beside the regulars. These are the governments "Green" army, with about 6,000 regulars and reserves, and 40,000 with guerrillas. The government also has a nationally-organized Civil Guard with a membership of 7,000.

Ireland thus remains a fair candidate for its old title of "the most distressful country that ever I have seen," and the visit of a prince who has never touched its soil before may be the match that drops into a dry tinder box.

POSTPONES MARRYING TO BE PASSION PLAY MADONNA

London.—A German girl who has spent eleven months in England working as a domestic servant in order that she might learn the English language is likely to be chosen to play the part of the Madonna at the Oberammergau Passion Play in 1934.

Fraulein Anna Rutz has already filled this role, and if she is chosen again she will set up a record for the part. Herone, daughter of the famous Anton Lang, who has portrayed the Christ so impressively on former occasions and who is once again to appear in this role. Maria was Anna's understudy on the last occasion.

One of the conditions of the selection of the cast is that the girl who portrays the Madonna shall be unmarried and so keen is the competition that Maria has put off her intended marriage for two years in order that she may not be barred from appearing.

The famous Passion Play, which always attracts a large number of tourists from England, originated 300 years ago from a terrible plague which swept through Bavaria. While all the neighborhood was stricken the little village of Oberammergau miraculously escaped the scourge, and in their thankfulness for this deliverance the simple peasants vowed that they would portray the Passion of Christ every ten years for all time. The last play was given two years ago and normally the next would not be due until 1940, but in view of the fact that 1934 will be the 300th anniversary of its inauguration, it has been decided to give an extra series of performances in that year.

Miss Crowdy also thought that boys should be "little brutes," because it was natural, and that they ought to be brought up by men who were the only people able to understand them. She maintained that boys taught by women teachers were more liable to become criminals than those taught by men.

"I feel sorry for girls who choose work rather than marriage," she said on one occasion. "They are like children throwing away the gold and keeping the tin." "The girl who takes up work," Miss Crowdy declared, "enjoys the freedom and the novelty at first, but by the time she is forty she feels the loneliness of her life."

"Girls are meant to marry. There is no getting away from that fact."

"Modern mothers neglect their duty by failing to train their daughters in the running of a home."

But perhaps the most widely quoted of all Miss Crowdy's sayings was: "A girl can do anything a boy can do—but ought she to do it?"
